The Cossacks do in some measure imitate us, who took their rise from their Victories upon the Euxine, and settled themselves by incountring the Tartars in those Desart Plains, which do so far resemble the Sea, that the Mariners Compass may be useful for Direction in the one, as well as the other. wanting of his life, or to make this a more accurate Description of those Countreys, must be imputed to the flender Traffick or Commerce they maintain with other Nations, and the little regard they have themselves to commit their own Actions to Posterity. And, I hope, it will be thought more strange, that there is any thing at all faid of them, then that there is so little. # COSSACKS.

He name of Cossavks was given them by reason of their Address and Agility in penetrating even in the most difficult and dangerous places such as the mouth of the Boristhenes, whereby they made War with the Turks and Tartars. Cosa fignifying in Polish, a Goat.

Long

Long agoe from the time of Sigismund Podolia, which lay always exposed to the I. there were Voluntiers from the the incursions of the Tartars, formed frontiers of Russia, Wolhinia, Podolia, and a Militia out of them, and gave them where they pillaged and facked whole Towns, as that of Trebisonde and Synopa, having the boldness sometimes to come within two Leagues of Constantinople, and carry away prisoners and plunder: at the latter end of the year these adventurers retired home, appointing first their Rendezvous where they were to meet in the Spring in some of the Islands or Rocks of the Boristhenes, from thence again to make their excursions.

King Stephen Batory, to whom Poland is beholden for many good Rules, considering the service which he might draw from these Rovers, towards the defence of the frontiers of Russia and Podolia other Provinces of Poland, which met the Town of Trethymiron upon the Botogether to practise their Pyracies upon risthenes for a Garrison, made a General the Black sea where they ordinarily met pover them, and gave him power to make with considerable advantages, and under-Officers, granting them besides brought away rich booty both from the their pay, divers priviledges and immu-Turkish Galleys and from the places nities, and joyned to this Infantry of the where they often landed in Natolia, Cossacks two thousand Horse, for the subfistance of which he designed the fourth part of his Crown-Lands whence they were called Quartani, and by corruption Quartiani.

> These forces thus established for the guard of the frontiers, did so secure it against the irruptions of the Tartars that all the desart Countrey, beyond the Towns of Bracklam, Bar, and Kiovia, began to be peopled, and many Townsand Fortresses were built there, every one bringing in Colonies from the neighboring Provinces.

This Militia thus regulated; sustained it self and rendred good service to the Crown.

In the year 1596. King Sigismund the III. having prohibited their Pyracies on the Elack Sea, upon the complaints which he received from the Grand Signior; they did indeed give them over, but it was, that they might fall upon Russia and Lythuania with the greater force, where they committed unheard of violences under Provinces of Poland are bound to 5 and therefore they perswaded King Vladeslaus and the States, that it was necessary to chastise the insolency of the Cossacks, they being able most of all to cross this defigne, as being a free people, and caufing by their example the other Countrey-men to bear their yoak more impatiently. So that it was resolved that a Fort should be built in a place called Kudak, upon the Boristhenes, a scituation very proper for the brideling of the Cosfacks, it being near the Porohi or Rocks of the River which they made use of for their most secure Retreat, and because they did immediately mistrust Colonel Marion a Frenchman, whom the General Koniespolski had left with two hundred men to build this Fort, he caused part of his Troops to winter there till it might be fit for defence. The loss of their Generals was seconded by the loss of their priviledges and the Town of Trethymirow granted to them formerly by King stephen, and at ength also by the suppression of their Militia, which the King of Poland Commanded h is his Officers to change into a new form, such an one as might be more fit for obedience.

Notwithstanding these disgraces they lost not their courage at all, but did their utmost to maintain their liberty.

After they had tried again the fortune of the war against General Potoski, and found themselves considerably weakened by divers encounters, they intrenched themselves beyond the Boristhenes, upon the River starcza, and for more then two Months sustained many assaults from the Poles, who after having lost many of their own men, were constrained to capitulate with these desperate people, and to promise them that they should be reestablished in their Priviledges and their Militia of six thousand men set on foot again as before, under the Command of a General appointed by the King, but these Articles were not betterkept with them then the former, and the most part of their men upon their going off, were either slain or plundered by the foldiers of the Polish Army; neither was their Militia reestablished, but a new one was set up, their General being changed, and the true Cossacks themselves excluded.

The Dammage which ensued upon this change was soon after very sensible, for the Tartars made an inroad two years after, entred a great way into the Vkrain, and destroyed the Territories about Pereaslaw, Corsun and Wisnowitz, whither before this disbanding of the Cossacks they were not wont to approach. They were therefore some time after set up again, and King Vladislaus, who made great account of this Militia in the war, which he intended to make against the Turks and Tartars, was no small contributor to their total reestablishment, making Bogdan Kmielniski, one of their own body, General over them, and withal increasing their number.

From all this discourse we may at prefent infer, that the Cossacks are rather a Militia then a Nation, as most have thought, and we cannot better compare them them then to the free Archers formerly established in France by Charles the VII. who were persons fit for Arms chosen out of all the Towns of his Dominion, and who upon the first Orders from the. King, were bound to meet at a general Rendezvous, and to serve in the wars; by which they were exempted from all Taxes and Imposts. The Cossacks are the same, chosen and listed in Russia, Volhinia and Podolia, and who enjoying many exemptions and priviledges, are in like manner bound to march wherefoever they are commanded; formerly they had no more then one onely Town for their retreat, as hath been already observed, and the Porohi of the Boristhenes, from whence they were called Zaporouski Cossacks, and are hereby distinguished from the Cossacks in Moscovia and from those upon the River Don or Tanais

Porohi, is a Russian term, signifying a rocky Stone; this River at fifty Leagues from the mouth of it, is crossed with a ridge of Rocks, which maketh a kind of damme damme or cataract, and by this means rendreth the Navigation in those parts impossible, and taketh away from Ukrain the means of inriching it self by the Traffick which it might otherwise have with Constantinople for Corn and other Merchandises in which it aboundeth as much as any other Countrey in the world; some of these Rocks are even with the water, others are above the water, the height of six, eight, and ten feet, and from this inequality there are in the River divers cascades or falls which the Cossacks themselves doe not pass but with a great deal of danger; there are thirteen of these falls, some of which are fourteen or fifteen foot high, when the water is low, and it is as necessary for a true Zaporouski Cossack to have passed these falls, and to have made a voyage upon the Black Sea, as for a Knight of Maltha before he come to the dignity of that Order, to have been in a Summers Expedition against the Turks.

Below the Porohi there are divers Islands in the River Boristhenes, and amongst mongst others there is one very remarkab'e, somewhat lower then the entrance of the River Czertomelik, compassed about with thousands of other little Isles, some of which are dry, others marshy, and all of them covered with Reeds, in fuch manner as it is hard to perceive the Channels which separate them; into this place, and into these windings and turnings the Cossacks make their retreat, which they call their skarbnifa, Woyskowa, that is to say, the Treasure of their Army, and here they shut up their booty which they have taken in their Pyracies upon the Black Sea, the acccess to this place is so difficult and dangerous, that many Turkish Galleys in pursuing them thither, have been lost, and it is here that the Cossacks hold their Rendezvous before they put out to sea.

After their arrival they choose a General to Conduct and Command them in their Expedition, and then fall to work about their Boats, which are about three-score foot long, and eleven or twelve foot broad, they have no Keel, but are built built onely upon a bottom of Willow or Limetree, sided or raised with plancks, which they pin one into another; the better to steer them when they are forced to flye, they have two Oars or Skulls on purpose, their sides are strengthened with Roaps of Reeds, as thick as a Barrel, to sustain these Boats against the fury of the waves, they have ordinarily ten or twelve Oars on each side, and rowe swifter then the Turkish Galleys; they have but a bad sail, and make use of it onely in fair weather, and choose rather to rowe when the wind is high; for their provisions in their voyage they take with them Biscuit, put up in a Tunn, and as they have use for it, take it out at the bung: besides this, they have a Barrel ofboiled Millet, and another of Paste mingled with water which they eat with the Millet, and it serves them both for meat and drink, and is counted by them a delitious dish; they carry no Aqua-vita nor other Strong-waters, for although they be as subject to drunkenness as any other Northern Nation, yet they are wonderfully sober in War. They

They meet ordinarily to the number of five or fix thousand men; about threescore of them are imployed to the making of one Boat, and in three weeks time the whole company makes ready about fourscore or an hundred; fifty or threescore men goe in each Boat, armed with five or fix Faulcons, and every one with two Harquebuses, and Powder and Ball sufficient. Their Admiral hath a Flag upon his Mast to distinguish him from the rest, they rowe altogether and so close, that their Oars touch one another, they wait till the latter quarter of the Moon, to get out of the River Boristenes, that they may by the help of the obscurity of some dark night, not be eyed by the Turkish Galleys who wait ordinarily at Oczakow, a Town of the Turks at the mouth of the River on purpose to observe them; so soon as they are discovered, all the Countrey is in Alarme as far as Constantinople, from whence they dispatch Couriers to all the coasts of Natolia, Romelia and Bulgaria, that all may stand upon their guard, but such is the diligence and swiftness of the Coffacks, cossacks, that they ordinarily prevent and outgoe the Couriers who are to bring news of their coming, knowing so well to take their opportunity by the time and season, that they often get into Natolia in the space of forty hours.

When they meet with any Galley or Vessel (which they discover better, and at a greater distance then they can be discovered ) their Boats being but two foot and an half above water) they approach towards them till night, keeping at about a Leagues distance, and then well observing the place where they faw the veffel, they begin to rowe about midnight with all their force, and encompassing it about, take it at unawares, it being impossible for a Vessel beset with fuch a number of Boats all at once, to difingage or defend it self; they take out the Money, Guns, and all the Merchandise which they can conveniently carry away, and afterwards fink the ship, they being not dextrous enough to carry her off, but as they have this advantage by night over ships and Galleys, so they are at great disadvantage by day, - for these with their great Cannon shot scatter them, and kill many of their men, of disposing their * Chariots, which is called and then especially when they doe most absolutely necessary when they march ber. vigorously prosecute their fight; from through those great desart Plains, where whence they oft bring back but halfe the Tartars run about continually: a their equipage, though true it is, that thousand Cossacks thus defended with they are seldom taken, by reason when their Chariots, will make head against they are pursued, they can retire into the Reeds or near the shoares, where dom alight from their Horses, so that the Galleys cannot come. The Grand a Ditch or a small baricado is able to Signior hath often complained of their Rop them, it would be very difficult Pyracies to the King of Poland, who never yet gave him any greater satisfaction for his Dammages, then he hath received from him, for the inroads of the Tartars, to whom there could never be raised up a more sutable Enemy then these Coslacks.

As to their manner of making war by Land, they are better Foot-men then Horse, they are patient, and laborious, obedient to their Commanders, and extremely dextrous at casting up earth, and intrenching; and not onely so, but also at another kind of ambulatory way of intrenching, which they perform by an handsome and orderly manner * This is fix thousand of those Infidels, who selin any other Countrey to make an Army march thus in the middle of Chariots, there being few Countreys in the world so flat and even as that.

The Countrey inhabited by the Cofsacks is called Ukrain, which signifies the Frontier, it extends it self beyond Volhinia and Podolia, and maketh a part of the Palatinates of Kiovia and Braclaw, some years since they made themselves Masters of these Provinces, and of a part of black Russia, which they have been forced fince to quit: this Countrey lieth between the 51 and

The Peasants in Ukrain, and the neighbouring Provinces are like Slaves, the same as they are in almost all places of Poland, being forced to work three or four days in the week for their Landlords, a Metropolitan Greek Church, Bialacer- Jords, and are charged besides with mafended their liberty with so much obstinacy; for this severe servitude hath disclosed all these brave Zaporowski Cosof late years, through the dispair into which, the severity of the Gentlemen and the Jews, cast the people of this Frontier, which hath constrained them to seek their Liberties, or the end of their Miseries among the rest.

The

The inhabitants of Ukrain, who are all at present called Cossacks, and glory in carrying that name, are of a good stature, active, strong, and dextrous in what they doe, liberal, and little caring to gather Riches, great lovers of Liberty, and that cannot suffer any yoak; unwearied, bold and brave, but very great drunkards; perfidious and treacherous; they delight in Hunting and Fishing, and in all Arts necessary to a Countrey-life, and to war, they have also this peculiar Art, that they understand best how to prepare Salt-peter with which their Countrey aboundeth, and from whence great quantity is transported into divers places of Europe; they carry much of it to Dantzick where the Hollanders and other Nations receive it.

This Countrey is very much incommodated with Flies, which sting so siercely in Summer, as to make their faces all swelled, who doe not lie under a kind of Net made like a soldiers Hut, covered with a cotton Cloth tucked in on the sides, and hanging down half a foot below the Bed, so that there may be left no place open: but they are much more infested with Locusts which come in some years, especially in very dry seasons; they are brought by an East or Southeast wind out of Tartary, Carcassia, and Mengrelia, which Countreys are scarce ever free from them; they come in clouds of five or six Leagues long, and three or four Leagues broad, and darken the Air in such fort, that the most clear weather becomes dusky; wherefoever they stay, they reap all the Corn in less then two hours time, though it be but green: these Insects live but six months; in the places where they stay; in Autumn they lay their Eggs, every one about three hundred, and in the following spring they are hatched, and if the weather be drie, turn into so many Locusts, the great Rains kill them, and by this means this Countrey is delivered from that scourge, or else by the North and Northwest winds, which drive them into the Black sea, when they are newly hatched, ed, and are not yet turned into Flies, they creep into Houses, into Beds, upon the Tables, and upon the Meat, so that they cannot eat without swallowing some of them: in the night they fall down into the high-ways and fields, which are sometimes covered with them, and when a Chariot comes to pass over them, they send forth an intolerable ill smell.

The Russians and Cossacks are afflicted with a disease called by the Physitians, Plica, and in the language of the Countrey Goschest, they who are seized with it, loose the use of their Limbs, as Paralitical persons doe, feeling great pains in their Nerves; this is followed by a great sweat in their Head, and after that, their Hair is all glued together, at which time the palsie leaveth them, but their Hair remaineth wreathed and in Elves-locks; this disease which is incident to Horses as well as Men, is thought incurable in that Countrey, but the Sieur de Beauplan assures us he hath cured many, by treating them in the fame fame manner as those who are infected with the Lues Venerea, and some have been insensibly delivered from it by the change of Air in passing from one Countrey to another; this disease proceedeth according to the common opinion from the crudity or some other bad quality of their waters; and this is remarkable in it, that it is communicated by Coition, as the French Pox: Some Children bring it with them into the world, and are cured as they grow up.

The language of the Cossacks is a dialect of the Polonian, as that is of the slavonian; it is very delicate, and aboundeth in Diminitives and pretty Fashions, and Manners, of elegant Speech.

As to their Religion, they make profession of the Greek, received in this Countrey in the year 942. in the Reign of Wlodomir Prince of Russia, the greater part of the Gentlemen profess either the Catholick, Lutheran, or Calvinist.

The Principal points in the Greek Religion wherein they differ from the Latine are, That they doe not admit of the proceeding of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, but from the Father onely, thinking that if they should believe him to proceed from both, it would suppose in him a double Understanding, and a double Will.

The Greeks also deny Purgatory, saying, That every one after this life according to his actions in it, is to expect the day of judgement; the good in pleasant and delicious places with the good spirits, and the evil in frightful and terrible habitations in company of the bad: founding this their belief upon that passage of Scripture, Venite benedicti patris mei possidere regnum cælorum, &c. & ite maledicti in ignem æternum; from whence they pretend to prove that there is no other judgement but that of the end of the world, it seeming to themincongruous that this sentence should be pronounced against those who are already judged. They

They doe not admit of the fingle lives of Priests, and receive none to that function but such as are married, beleeving that the Roman Priests are anathematized by the Councel held at Gangra in the fourth Canon of which it issaid, Qui spernit Sacerdotem secundum legem uxorem habentem, dicens quod non liceat de manibus ejus Sacramentum sumere anathema sit: and in another place, omnis sacerdos & diaconus propriam uxorem dimittens, sacerdotio privetur, so that they hold Marriage to be so Essential to the priesthood that a Priest when he burieth his Wife can no longer exercise his sacerdotal Functions; these Priests are ordinarily taken out of Colledges or Monasteries, where they choose those of longest standing and greatest abilities.

They refuse all Councels, fince the seventh Occumenical Assembled under Pope Adrian, in which they say it was determined, that all things decided and resolved of in the preceding Council, till that time, should remain firm and stable stable for ever, but that whosoever for the future should assemble any other Council, or meet at it, should be an Anathema, so that they count all what hath been determined of in the Church fince that time to be Heretical and corrupted. The Fathers which they follow, are S. Bazile, S. Gregory Nazianzen, s. Chrysostome; they read also the Morals of s. Gregory the Great, and having a great opinion of their Sanctity, they hold in great Veneration all the Popes who were before the Seventh Council. They celebrate their Liturgy in Greece, and in Natolia in the antient Greek Language, but the Muscovites and Russians have it in their own, yet they also mix some Greek Hymnes with it, they consecrate with leavened Bread, and think it strange that the Roman Priests should make use of unleavened, and should imitate the Jews in this, and yet not retain their Sabboth or Circumcision: besides, they say it is expresly set down in the Gospel, That our Saviour at the last supper took Bread, which cannot be taken for unleavened Bread, for for the Jews eat not of that but at the Passover, and standing, when on the contrary, Our Lord at the institution of the last Supper, sate down, or rather laid down with the Apostles, recumbentibus duodecem, &c. and whence they conclude that he did not then keep the Passover, but that it was some other repast. They invoke Saints and Angelsasthose of the Roman Church doe, and the blessed Virgin and the Apostles, whose Festivals they solemnize; and the Russians, principally that of s. Nicholas of Myrea, whom they particularly adore.

Their Baptisme, Confession, Marriage, Ordination of their Priests, and their extreme Unction, differ little from the Latines, the difference which there is in the Encharist is, that the people communicate in both kinds, and that the Sacrament is administred to Children of three years old, they have their Hostia's apart for the sick, which they consecrate in the Holyweek.

Their

Their Fasts are more frequent and more austere then ours, they abstain not onely from Fiesh, but from Butter, Milk, Cheese, Eggs, and Fish also, living onely upon Cabbage, parsnips, Mushrooms, and Pulse; there are some also so devout that they content themselves with Bread and Water, excepting Saturdays and Sundays, yet for all this the Muscovites are often drunk in their Lents, and doe not believe any more then the Polanders, that excessive drinking doth any way break their Fasts; they have four Fasts in the year, the first answereth to our Lent, and lasts seven weeks; the second beginneth from the Octave after Whitsuntide, and ends at the Vigils of S. Peter and S. Paul; the third from the first of August to the Assumption of the blessed Virgin; and the last is during the Advent, which beginneth fifteen days sooner then that of the Church of Rome, they observe the same abstinence on Wednesdays and Fridays; there are very few points in which the Russian and Greek Church differ, they holding the same Communion and fourfourscore years since did acknowledge the Patriarch of Constantinople, since which time the Great Duke of Muscovy hath thought fit to nominate the Archbishop of Mosco, upon which nomination he is consecrated by two or three of his Suffragans. The Bishops of Black Russia or Southern Russia did since that fet up a Church apart, and seeing the progress of the divisions which Luther and Calvin had made in their respective Countreys, they determined in a Synod which they held for the sustaining of themselves, to re-establish the union of their Church with the Roman Catholick, and to this intent, in the year 1595. they deputed two, and fent them to Rome, who in the name of the Churches of Black Russia, presented in writing a confession of Faith conformable to the belief of the Council of Trent, after that they had stipulated that they should retain the Ceremonies of the Greek Church used when the union was made with the Latine at the Council of Florence, but they are since fallen off.

DISCOURSE

TARTARS.

There are two great Nations in the world, who live very much after the same manner, are of the same Religion, and pretend to the same original; these are the Arabs and the Tartars, the first living in part of Asia and of Africa, and the latter possessing all the Northern Regions of Asia, and extending their Territories into Europe: some of these are more civilized then the others, have Towns and Literature, and improve their knowledge in Arts and Sciences, but the most part of them live a wandring life up and down in the Fields and Plains, in Tents or Sheds, or else contented to have no other covering but the Heaven, not addicting themselves to Agriculture, but delight in Hunting, Fighting, Robbing, and have little other Riches then their Heards and Flocks.

All these Tartars are divided into Horde figuisses Hordes, and the Arabs into Heyles or a Con-Cobeyles, and almost all these people, gregations make no allyance out of their own Lineage and Blood from whence apparently proceeds, that great resemblance which they have to one another; and some peculiar Features which doe easi; ly distinguish them from other Nations.

The Tartars have not been known by this name, but for about four hundred years, and are properly the Scythians; some Authors, as Leunclave and others, derive this name from the River Tartar, in the Countrey where they did inhabit.

There are some who say that the name of Tartar is improper and corrupted, and that they ought to be called Tatares or Totares, a word which in the Syriack Language signifies a Remnant, supposing that these people are the remnant of the Ten Tribes which Salmanazar and his predecessors led away captive into Asyria, and who afterwards resolved to separate themselves from the Gentiles, and passed into a Countrey not inhabited, there to exercise their Religion, and to observe the laws which they had formerly neglected

Tartary is devided into five parts, the first is the lesser Tartary, or Tartary of Prezecop, called also Crim Tartary. The second is Sarmatia, Asiatica, which containeth many Hordes of the Tartars subject to the Great Duke of Moscovia, as the Czeremisses, the Nagais, Zauolhaus, and those of Cazan and Astracan. The Third is Zagatay, or the Countrey of Uzbek, otherwise called Scythia beyond the Mount Imaus, which extends it self between between the Rivers of Chefel, otherwise Jaxarte, and Gehon, or Oxe, and comprehendeth Bactriana, and Sogdiana; and in this Tartary Reigned the famous Tamberlane. The Fourth is Cathay or great Tartary. And the Fifth is, That Tartary which was unknown to Ptolomy and lieth most remote in the North-east part of Asia.

The lesser Tartary formerly called Taurica Chersonesus, hath received the name of Pracopensis, from a Town called Przecop, scituated in the Istmus of the Peninsula: Przecop in the Sclavovi-an Language, signifying a place ditched or digged; there being a Ditch which cutteth through this neck of Land; it is called also Crim, from one of its principal Towns of that name.

The Tauri were the antient inhabitants, and gave name to this Countrey, many Greek Colonies came thither afterwards, and then some Hordes of the Tartars who came out from about the Caspian Sea, and after they had harradid at length fall into this Countrey, and take possession of it all, about 460. years since, except Cassa and some other Ports which remained in the hands of the Genoeses from the year one thousand two hundred and sixty six, till one thousand four hundred and seventy four, when Mahomet the second Emperor of the Turks took it from them.

Leagues long, and in some parts thirty Leagues broad, in others less; but the lesser Tartary is of a greater extent, comprehending Budziak, which is a Countrey lying between the Niester and the Boristhenes, as far as the Don or Tarair, and all along the Sea of Elle Zabacche, or Palis Maotis.

only incultivated Plains, yet of themfelves very fruitful, and the Tartars encamp up and down in them as they find more or less forrage, and make use sheds, onely in the winter to defend themselves against the great cold and snow, which we mean also of those onely who are left to keep the Herds and Flocks; as for the rest they are ordinarily employed about this time, when the Rivers and Marshes are frozen up, to make their inroads, and plunder in Ukrain, and upon the frontiers of Moscovy.

The Towns of this Peninsula are first Przecop, called or by the Tartars, where there are about four hundred Houses; it is soituated upon the Eastern part of the Istinus, being half a League about s coslow, seated on one of the Capes of the Peninsulaupon the Black sea, having about two thousand Houses, and is a Town of Trade belonging to the Cham: Crim, another Town of the Cham's, scituated upon a Bay which the Palus Maotis maketh, and is inhabited by few else but by the Tartars. Baciasary where the Cham ordinarily keepeth his Court of about two thousand Houses. Almasaray masaray, another Palace belonging to the Cham, whither he often goeth, but the Town by it hath not above three or fourscore Houses.

The places possessed by the Turk, are the Port of Baluelawa; very much esteemed, where the Ships and Galleys are made for him, but there are not there above two hundred Houses at most. Ingermen, and Mancup, Castles with ruined Towns, but the most considerable place is Caffa, formerly called Theodosta, when the Genoeses were Masters of it, it was one of the most trading Towns of the Levant, but it is since faln from its Grandeur, and hath run the same fortune with most of those Towns, which have fallen under the Ottoman Dominion; yet there are still remaining about five or fix thousand Houses: the Inhabitants are Greeks, Italians; the remainder of the Genoeses, Armenians, Jews, Turks and Tartars, but the most part of them are Christians, who have had to the number of five and forty Churchesthere, either Greek, Arminian, or Latine

Taurica Chersonesus consisteth partly of fruitful Plains, and partly of Woods and Hills, it producethall fort of Grain and excellent Fruit and Wine. The Christians and Jews Till the Ground; the Tartars imploy their Slaves in the same labor, esteeming it an employment below them, but the Tartars without, despise it more, and choose rather to be Shepheards and Robbers: Their Horses and Cattel are their Riches, with the Booty and Slaves of both Sexes, which they take in their incursions and sell to the Merchants of Caffa, afterthey have provided for themselves, and furnished the Cham, who hath the priviledge to take first what Men and Women he pleaseth; these Slaves are afterwards carried away by the Merchants of Constantinople, Synopa and Trebisonde, and other places of the East, especially the Women and Maids of Poland, who are carried away sometimes as far as Persia and India, to furnish the Serraglio's of those Countreys where they are much esteemed; formerly the soldans of Ægypt did furnish them-themselves with Soldiers out of Taurica Chersonesus, composing their Militia of Slaves taken by the Tartars in Russia, Podolia, Moscovia, and Circassia. But since the ruine of that Military Empire by Selim, that Commerce with Egypt hath ceased. The Tartars receive from the Christian and Jewish Merchants in exchange for their Slaves and Cattel which they bring them, Turkish Horses, Arms, Stuffs for cloathing and other Commodities.

The Pracapian Tartars are most of them of a middle stature, strong, and thick Limbs, short Neck, broad Face, their Eyes small, but very black, and opening wide, their complexion Tawny, and other particular Lineaments they have which doe easily distinguish them from among many other men, hardened to all sort of Labour and Pains from their very infancy. Their Mothers bath them almost every day in water, in which Salt is dissolved, to make their bodies more strong, and less apt to be penetrated by the injuries of the

the Air, which I have seen also practised by the Polish Women, but these are contented to prepare this Lye onely once a week, their Fathers teach them very early to draw the bowe, and from the age of twelve or fifteen years they carry them with them to the wars.

The Tartars who live abroad, are habited in Sheep-skins with a Cap of the same Stuffe; their Arms are ordinarily a Cimeter, a Bow and a Quiver, with about twenty Arrows; they make themselves these Arms, thus, their Bows out of Horses Pizzels, their Quiver, out of his skin, and tye the heads of their Arrows with little Thongs cut out of the same skin of the same Animal, of which also they make their Whips so neatly, by a particular Art which they have, that our Sadlers in France and Germany, have not yet been able to imitate them; they begin to use Fire-arms, and all of them are furnish'd with Knives and Instruments to mend their Bridles and Saddles, which they also make themselves; they carry with with them a Steel to strike fire, and a Mariners Compass, a Sun-dyal to guide them through the defart Plains where there is no beaten way or path. The chief among them wear Cloth of divers colours, have Linnen made of Cotton, Coats of Mail, Turkish Saddles. and are in an handsome equipage, purchased either of the Armenian Merchants, or taken in War; all ride very short, and carry their Legs bended and high, after the manner of the Poles, Turks, Arabs, and of all the Eastern Nations, and the Africans. Their Horfes which they call Bacmates, are long, ugly, and lean, have the Hair of their Neck thick, and great Tayls which hang down to the ground; but Nature hath very well repaired their ugliness by their swiftness, and their incomparable and indefatigable service they perform in travelling, being able to carry their Riders whole days journeys without drawing Bit; they feed at all times, and when in winter the Earth is covered with Snow, and the Tartars make their incursions, they live either either upon what is under the Snow, or upon the Branches or sprouts of Trees, Pine tops, Straw, or any thing they can find; the chief of the Tartars have Turkish and Arabian Horses, and their Cham very good Race-horses.

The travelling Tartars scarce eat any bread coming seldom into places, where it is to be had, butthey make use of Millet, which is very common amongst them, with which they make their Drink and Pottage; and eat ordinarily Horseflesh which they boil when they are at leisure, either alone or with their Millet, but when they goe to war and are upon their March, they make it ready, or rather mortify, or just heat it, under their Saddles, and eat it. afterwards in this condition without any other fauce then the froth upon the Flesh, made by the sweating of the Horse, neither doe they choose the most fat or the most sound and wholsome Horses to make their Provision of, but they take such as are spent with their long marches, or are sick and lame 3 0 1 3 0 2 4 4

lame, and I have feen at my being in Poland, divers Tartar prisoners come and take away dead Horses out of the Stables to feast one another with, so that there is no fear in those Countreys that the carcasses of dead Beasts should infect the Air, they will take an order for that, and not fail to carry them away, assoon as they know where they are; the use of Wine being forbidden them by the Law of Mahomet, their drink is ordinarily clear water, and in winter fnow, when the Brooks and Rivers are frozen over, and sometimes the broth made with their Horseslesh, and the Skumme, or else Breha, which is a drink made with boiled Millet, but those who are better accommodated, and more delicate, drink Mares milk, Mead, and Strong waters, and eat Lamb, Kid, Fowls, and all fort of Game which they take; they delighting much in Hunting and Fowling; but all abstain from Swines-flesh, and one may fay this of whem in general, that they are sober and continent; as for the cham himself he keeps a better better Table, and fares more delicioully, is nobly lodged, and lives magnificently, and as becomes one of his Quality.

Their Language is much like the Turkish, both of them having the same original, onely the Turkish is more mixed with Persian and Arabick words; their Religion is the Mahumetan.

As to their Morals, there are very few Nations to be found less vitious, for besides their continence, they are extremely sincere, and faithful, they have no Thieves or false witnesses amongst them, little injustice or violence, and live in Union and great tranquility; as to their harasing the Christian Countreys, they doe not think they commit any fault or injustice in doing it, seeing that they are esteemed by them as people that are Insidels and abominable.

The marvellous fidelity of the Captive Tartars in Poland is every day to be obobserved, who never fail to return at the time appointed, when they are let loose upon their word to goe and procure their Liberties by the exchange of Polish prisoners, which they execute punctually, or return themselves not failing a minute; and I have observed that the Polish Gentlemen doe rather trust the young Tartars, which are in their service, with the keys of their Money and Jewels, then any other of their Houshold.

These People obey one Prince whom they call their Cham or King; the Polanders name him the Czar or Cæsar, he is much respected by his own People and Reigneth despotically, as almost all other Mahumetan Princes do; the Cham hath power of nominating his successor, who is ordinarily his Son or one of his Brothers, he that is to succeed; is called the Galga; the Nobles or most considerable of his Subjects are named Murzas. Since that Selim, Emperor of the Turks brought a part of Taurica Chersonesus under his obedience; the Chams are not become Tributaries, as some say, but Vassals to the Grand Signior, in fuch fort, as for a mark of his Soveraignty over them, they receive a Standard from him at the change or installation of every Cham. The first King or Cham of these People was one Ulan, whose birth they report to be miraculous; his Successors were supplanted about two hundred years agoe by the Geereys, a Family which at this day sits upon the Throne, yet their are some left of the former, still called Ulans, and are to succeed in the Government when the House of the Geereys shall be extinct.

The Religion of the Pracopian Tartars being Mahumetan, and their Language the Turkish, together with their nearness to Constantinople; the Government also is very like to that of the Turks; the Cham's first Minister of State is called the Vizier, the same as the Grand Signior's; they have also Priests and Caditi's to doe justice, for the administration of which they have no other Code but the Alcoran, and no other interpreter of that but their own common Sense; the parties plead their own Cases, which are briefly and readily dispatched; the Chamhimself doth Justice, and determines Controversies, especially when he goeth forth in publick, without acception of persons, hearing the poor as well as the rich. Drunkenness, Murder, Adultery, and Theft are most rigorously punished, and though they be much accustomed to rob in War, yet they totally abstain from it in their own Countrey, where wearing of any Arms is prohibited them, even in the Cham's Court.

The forces of this Prince are very numerous, for gathering together all the hords, of the Tartars, who doe either obey him or are his Allies, he is able to bring into the field many thousand Horse; they have no Foot but some fanisaries which they receive from the Turk upon any expedition which they make by his Order or Agreement; there are some few Garri-

fons

Ions in the Castles and strong places of Taurica Chersonesus, the most considerable is in the Fortress of Przecop, or Or, which hath notwithstanding but a bad Ditch four or five fathoms over, and a Rampart of seven or eight foot high, and two fathoms and half over; here lieth always a strong Guard to defend the entrance of the Peninsula, and he that is Governor is Commander of all the Hordes of the Tartars, as far as the Boristhenes.

The wars which the Tartars ordinarily make, are rather an inroad then any thing else.

How strict peace soever they have with the Christians their neighbors, they doe not fail to visit them often, either upon their inclination, or upon the Command of the Cham, who always pretends to a Tribute from the Moscovites and Polanders, which they have paid sometimes when necessity hath forced them, and refused at others, as not being willing to subject themselves to these acknowledgements towards Insidels

Infidels, and those whom they despise When the Tartars would make any great inroad either into Poland or Moscavy; they choose ordinarily the full Moon of January, all the Rivers, Lakes and Marshes, being then frozen, and the Earth, especially in the plain Defarts covered with Snow, which is very commodious for their Horses which are not shod; every Tantar carrieth two with him, either for change, or to carry his booty and provision; neither is his provision very weighty, consisting onely of a little Millet, dried Flesh powdered after the manner of the Turks, and some Garlick, which they hold very proper to digest so many crude Meats as they eat, and many times they carry nothing, feeding onely upon the flesh of their Horses which perish in their march; they take their way through the Valleys and most obscure passages, that they may not be discovered by the Cossacks, who always keep Centry and Watch, and are out upon parties to hear news of them, and fo to allarm the Countrey. That which is most

most surprising is, That in the middle of winter they incamp without fire, for fear of being discovered, and eat little but Horseflesh stewed under their Saddles; when they are arrived at those places where they intended, whither it be in Ukrain or elsewhere, their Generals let loose one third part of their Army, which is divided into divers Troops, and these over-run and pillage all the Countrey five or fix Leagues about the wings of their Army; their main body in the mean time keeping close together, to be in a posture to fight their Enemies, if their should be occasion; afterwards this party being returned, they let loose another in its turn, observing always this Order, That all their Troops which runup and down, may in a few hours return to the body of their Army: after they have pillaged and harrased the Countrey five or fix days, they return as fast as they can, that they may not be set upon in their retreat, and having regained the open desart Plains, where their Body confisting of Horse, they

they have great advantage in fight; they make a halt to refresh themselves awhile, and to share the Booty and Prisoners. They make their incursions also in Summer, but not in such great numbers, seldom so many as ten thousand together, and these are the Tartars of Budziak, who at that season lead their Horses and Cattel into the Plains to feed, and so getting ground, they of a suddain run out and take away all they meet; nor is it easie to stop them but with a thousand men, marching always in Tabor.

The Tartars fight not but in great Troops of two, three, or four thousand Horse, and seldom give battle but when they are much the stronger, and when their Army is forced and broken up by the enemy, they scatter and disperse themselves into so many little Troops, that the Polanders and Germans, who march close and by squadrons, know not which to set upon in their retreat; they shoot their Arrows from behind them, with such exactness as to hit those those who pursue them at two hundred paces distance, and at a quarter of a League from thence rally their forces again and return presently to charge; this they repeat often, it being their manner of fighting, but it is onely thus, when they are the greatest number, for otherwise when they once run, it is full speed, and not to return again, and it is difficult to surprise them, they keeping strict watch all night, not easie to defeat them, unless it be in some streight, or upon some pass of a River.

The prisoners which they take, they make Slaves and sell them to the Merchants of Constantinople and Cassa, and other places of the East, who either keep them to wait upon themselves, or to look after their Cattle, or till the Ground, entertaining with the same face as we have formerly spoken of, as divers Polish and French Officers have related unto me; amongstothers, Lieutenant-Collonel Nicolai, and Captain Croustade, who most unfortunately fell into their hands; but the Poles are en

ven with them, for except those Children whom they choose to wait upon them, and Baptize and instruct in the Christian Religion, or some Murza which they thut up and treat well enough, and hope to exchange for some Polish Nobleman, prisoner in Tartary; the rest are kept as Slaves, having always Irons upon their feet, and are made use of as Beasts to carry all manner of burthens, Lime, Brick, and all other materials for building, Wood for their Kitchins and Chambers, and to make clean their Houses, and Plough, and other labors, being always followed by one who keeps them to their work, yet these poor people get some time to make Whips, which they sell and buy provisions with the Money, their ordinary allowance being onely Bread and Water, unless when they get a-dead Horse; when I was at War-Jaw, I had opportunity to take notice of two or three hundred of them, who lived after this manner, either under the King, or some great Polish Nobleman.

erful Enemies to deal with, as the German Empire, the Knights of the Teutonick Order, since their establishment in Prussia, often backed by German Forces; the Tartars who have made frequent incursions, and sometimes traversed the Countrey from one end to the other. The Turks who came in the year 1621. to Choczin upon the Niestre with an Army of four hundred thousand men, and seemed to swallow up the Kingdom, and the rather, because at the same time the King of sweden, Gustavus Adolphus entred into Liefland with a considerable force, yet have the Poles made head against all these Enemies, though never so redoubtable, and those Wars never appeared so dangerous to them, as that which insued upon the defection of the Cossacks in the year 1648. almost at the very moment of the death of their King, for these Rebels did not onely ingage all those of Black Russia to rise with them, but at once laying off all that mortal and irreconcileable hatred which they have always had for the Tartars, they made a League with them, and did proceed further to implore the assistance of the Turk towards the total ruine and destruction of Poland.

Having therefore joyned their forces with those of the Infidels, they made in less then four years time, four great irruptiirruptions into this Kingdom with Armies of two or three hundred thousand fighting men, who were the more formidable, by reason that their Infantry, hardned to all labor and injuries of the weather, and sufficiently warlike by their frequent incountring the Tartars invasions, were now sustained and backed by the Tartar Cavalry, which without contradiction would be the best in the world if it were exercised with the same Martial Discipline as that of Christendom.

Bogdan Kmielniski was the first spark which kindled this fire, and the hinge upon whom this war moved, he was born a Gentleman, son to the Podstarroste of a Polish General, being inrolled young in the Cossackian Militia; from a private soldier he attained by degrees to the charge of a Captain, and was deputed from this Militia to the Diets of Poland, was afterwards made Commissary-General, and in the end General, having besides this some tincture of literature, a thing very rare in any of those people; King Uladiflans being weary of languishing in a flothful quietness, while that most part of the other Kings and Princes of Christendom were in action, in the year 1646. defigned a war against the Pracopian Tartars, whom he pretended to drive out of Crimea, and judged Kmielniski, worthy to Command the Cossackian Army, of which he made very great account, especially in this expedition; but the Kings designe not being seconded by the Christian Princes, who were employed otherwise, nor by the Venetians themselves, upon whose assistance he did very much depend, and on the other side the States of Poland being jealous of his raising forces, he was obliged to disband and pay off his Troops with a good part of his Queens Dowry. Kmielniski was by this means out of service, yet soon found occasion of imploying himself upon a dispute which happened about his Estate, between him and Czapliniski, Lieutenant to Konielpolski, Great enfigne of the Crown, and was the more exasperated rated by the ill treatment which his own Wife and Son received, who in the strife happened to be struck with a Cudgel: he was not long before he returned the injury, for discovering that the Russes were disposed to set themselves free, and could no longer relish that peace. which instead of procuring them repose, gave a greater opportunity to their Noblemen to keep them in servitude and oppression; he very well managed their discontents, and assured himself of the Cosacks, retiring himself about the beginning of the year 1648. towards the Porohi, or Isles of the Boristhenes, there to fortify and put himself in defence against any assault of the Polanders.

Some thought, and with great probability, that King Vladislaus, being willing to take in hand again the designe of his expedition against the Tartars, entertained a private correspondence with him, and was the cause under-hand that the Cossacks revolted, to the end that the States of Poland furnishing nishing him with an Army to suppress them, when they came to meet, they might joyn their forces, and the greatest part being strangers, and Commanded by those who are intimate with them, they would little have regarded the Orders of the States, but followed this Prince against the Tartars and against the Turks also, with whom they would necessarily have been ingaged, having attacqued the former 5 but howsoever it was, Kmielniski seeing that the Letters which he fent into Poland to complain of the injuries done to the Cossacks, and to him in particular, although full of submission and protestations of Obedience, were of no effect; but on the contrary, the Great General Potoski was preparing to come against him; and distrusting his own strength, he called for affiltance from the Tartars, who passed the winter in the desart Plains, seeking their opportunity to make their ordinary inroads, and plunder in Vkrain, conducted by Tohaibeg, one of their Captains, a brave Commander, but often mutinous, and refractory fractory to the Orders of the Cham.

The great distance of places was favourable to Kmielniski, and kept the Polish Generals some time from the knowledge of his private Treaties, but so soon as they had certain advice thereof, they resolved to march with all diligence towards the Zaporovian Islands, and to stifle this revolt in its Cradle, they dispatched therefore on that side, a part of the Polish Army defigned for the Guard of the frontiers, and particularly the body of cossacks entertained in the service of the States under the conduct of schomberg their Commissary. Stephen Potoski, Son to the General Sapiha Czarnecki, and some other Officers. Part of the Cossackian Militia which was imbarked upon the Boristhenes, being arrived at the Forobi, went immediately over to Kmielniski, violating in favour of their Countreymen, their Oath of Allegiance to the Polanders, which they had so lately taken. Kmielniski marching with this recruit against the rest of the Cossacks, easily easily obliged them to follow the example of the former. among these latter, there were some Troops of Dragoons which did excellent service in this war against the Polish Nobility, who to save the charges of a German Guard, which the Gentlemen of that Countrey used to have about their persons, had Armed and Habited many of those Countrey-men after the fashion of the German Dragoons, renewing thus their courage by the change of their condition, and bringing them out of the baseness of slavery. Kmielniski fortified with these revolting Cossacks, found no great difficulty to overcome the rest of the Polish Troops, who were not in all above sifteen hundred men ; the Poles defended themselves some days A certain in the middle of their Tabor, but haintrench-ving lost their Canon, and not being able to resist so great a number which enmade compassed them on all sides, they were Chariots all either slain or made slaves by the The Polish Council of War delibera-Tartars; Sapitza was one of these; ting therefore what was to be done. schomberg was mortally wounded, and found no expedient better then that Potoski not being able to be carried a of continuing their retreat in the midway.

way, died in the field. Kmielniski carefully managing this advantage, had the Glory which ordinarily accompanies the first victory, made head against the rest of the Polish Army, which consisted of about five thousand men, and whose Commanders having long expected the news of their first Troops ordered towards the Boristhenes, and now being certainly informed of their defeat, as that also the Cossacks had deserted them, and that the Tartars were joyned with the Rebels, thought it necessary to retreat, for the preservation of the forces of the Kingdom, but it was now too late, for the Bacmates o- So they vertaking them, began to skirmish with raresrithem, and some Tartars being taken pri- an Horsoners, did confess upon the Rack, that ses. their Army consisted of forty thousand men, besides seven thousand cossacks, and the Countreymen of the adjacent Colonies who came in hourly to them. dle dle of their Chariots, neither was this sufficient, for they had scarce marched halfe a League before they entred into a thick Forrest, whose bottom was Marshy and full of Boggs, and to make them still more exquisitely unhappy, the Cossacks who remained with them, to the number of eighteen hundred, did then forsake them, so that after four hours striving, as well against the bad ways as their enemies, and their Tabor being broken up, and they set upon on all sides, most of them were either killed upon the place, or choaked in the Mudd.

This misfortune which happened about Korsun, became more sensible to Poland by reason of the death of King Vladislaus the IV who died at this time at Mereche in Lithuania in the two and sistieth year of his age, no man doubting but this Prince by his valour joyned with all those other great perfections which he was endowed with, and which made him venerable and beloved by his own, as well as esteemed and and feared by his enemies, would by his Authority and great name, have quickly suppressed this new rising, and but yet Infant Rebellion of the Cossacks.

The Kings death was not presently known to Kmielniski, who, if he had been informed of it, would not have failed to have shown more fierceness then he did after the defeat of the Polish Army; upon which he wrote a very submissive Letter to the King, in which he laid all that was passed upon the insolence of the Governors, and upon the Rapines and insupportable Exactions of the Jews, who for Farmers of the Kings Land, and of many Gentlemens Estates, he asked pardon for what he was constrained to doe in his own defence, promised to send back the Tartars, and to live in obedience to his Majesty, if he would be pleased to maintain him and his Cossacks in their liberty and priviledges granted them by the former Kings his predecessors, but a while after he understood the King was dead, by a Letter sent him from

from Adam Kissel Palatine of Braclamby the hands of a Greek Monk: this Palatine who was also a Greek, used very milde and obliging expressions to bring back the head of the Cossacks to his obedience, setting forth to him the antient fidelity of the Zaporowski Cossacks, who though they were very jealous of their Liberty, were always very constant, and lived in a State where all persons, but chiefly Men of War, had always free access to make good their interests, and to complain of their injuries which they received; that he, being the onely Scnator of the Greek Religion, and Protector of their Rites and Churches, which he did always most heartily defend: did conjure him by the Saintity of the same Religion, and the Honour of the Russian Nation, that he would send home the Tartars, and lead the Cossacks back into their ordinary stations, and that in the mean time he would depute some persons to make known the injuries which they and he in particular had received, and to defire some redress, offering his own care and

and services to help them to all the satisfaction they could pretend to, and withal, he was a person of that rank and quality in the State, that no Determinations or Orders could be given either for peace or war, without his being advertised of it; but he assured them, he should always be inclined to have these disorders terminated in a peaceable way, rather then to have them entertained by the continuation of a Civil war; and that their Armsat present imployed in their mutual Ruine, might be more profitably, and glorioully made use of against the enemies of Christendome. The Tartars were apt upon the least occasion to take up Arms, but their first heat and choler being past, they returned of themselves, and were reconciled without any Mediation, they should therefore take their leaves of them, and retain nothing but this laudable custom of theirs. The Monk who carried this Letter was in great danger of falling into the hands of the Tartars, but escaping with much difficulty, he arrived at the Camp of Kmielniski, which he found confused enough; the General called the foldiery together in a tumultuous way, had the Letter read before them, and was the first himself who approved the Council of the Palatine of Braclaw; and being backed by the Plurality of voices, it was determined that all acts of hostility should cease, and that they should wait for an answer from the Court of Poland; that the Tartars should be sent back into the defart Plains, with Orders there to keep themselves ready upon all occasions, and that the Palatine should be invited to come to the Camp. This moderation of Kmielniski, when his affairs were at that heighth, surprized all the world, although it were not void of artifice, for as on one side it appeared that he had put a stop to the course of his victories, to hinder any further bloodshed, and to obtain pardon more easily, so on the other, he made this ostentation of his power to the Polanders, to extort from them, what he could not perhaps have obtained onely by his Submis-fubmission. Retiring therefore into the Town of Bialacerkiew, he kept himfelf quiet, while that Crzivonos, another Commander of the Coslacks, a person of little worth, but bold and horribly cruel, harrassed Black Russia and Podolia, Kmielniski pretended to disallow of these violences, and promised to put this Crzivonos and five other Commanders of the Peasants in Rebellion into the hands of the Polanders, but this was all to amuse them, that he might at the same time the better seize upon the fortress of Bar.

Jeremiah Michael Duke of Wisnowitz arriving on the borders of Russia with some Troops, to whom were joyned those of Janus Tiskewitz, Palatine of Kiovia, and the Kings Regiment of Guards, Commanded by Ossinski, Lieutenant-General of Lithuania, opposed these incursions of Crzivonos, and stopped his progress who would otherwise have overrun the Kingdom with those great numbers with him. Many other Troops and the Rear made up of the Nobility of the Frontiers, making a new Army, they marched against the Cossacks, and the rebellious Peasants, after they had endeavoured a second time, but all in vain, to make an accommodation with their Commanders.

The State of Poland was made more sensible upon this occasion then ever before of the greatness of that loss which it sustained by the death of their King; there being now no person of Authority enough to Command so many Great men as were at that time in the Army, who would by no means give place to one another and their dif-Tentions and disorders at length grew so high, that the most judicious, considering in what condition affairs were, thought it absolutely necessary to avoid fighting; in pursuance of which Council, it was resolved that they should retreat in good order in the middle of their Tabor towards Constantinow; but these Orders were so ill understood then, when some Troops about Pilaucze began began to move; others not waiting their times, marched away before the rest, and began a confusion, which being increased by the obscurity of the night, and communicated to all that followed, it struck such a panick fear into the whole Army, that even the most brave were not exempt from it, who could not be so soon informed of the cause of this general flight and consternation: This would have secured an intire victory to Kmielniski, if he had not been involved in the same ignorance, but he knew so little of what passed, that he took this flight of the Polanders for a stratagem, nor could he beleeve the truth of the report, and instead of pursuing them with all diligence, he contented himself to follow them flowly, and with all circumspection, till at length being undeceived, with a sad heart he turned his forces against Leopold, a Town very considerable for its Trade, especially into the East, and indifferently strong, but at that time not furnished with Forces or Provisions, fit for its defence. Arcissenski an old old Officer who had a long time served abroad, and been a Commander under the Hollanders in Brasil, was left therein, and put in hopes of being speedily relieved from the Lesser Poland. The Inhabitants Commanded by this Officer made a strong resistance for some days, but the Castle forsaken by those who defended it, being taken by the besiegers, and there being little hope left of holding out long against so numerous an Army as lay before the Town, and the want of Provisions being afflicting already, they redeemed themselves and bought off the Enemy from the Walls with a confiderable sum.

The Cossacks having quitted Leopold, came before Zamoscie, a Town fortified after the modern way by John Zamoski, Great General, and Great Chancellor of Poland in the time of King Sigismund, Father to the two last Kings.

This place was at that time the onely Asylum for the Nobility of Russia, who had been driven from their Estates by the revolted Peasants, and there being being a good party in the Town from the Palatinates of Belz, and Sendomir, and fifteen hundred men which Louis Weiher Palatine of Pomerania had brought thither out of Prussia; all the attempts which the Cossacks and rebellious Peasants made for a months time, were all in vain, so that after they had lost many men, they retreated to the bottom of Russia.

We must not pass over in silence the affistance which the Poles received from his most Christian Majesty, who although the fire of Civil war began already to be kindled in France, permitted that the eight hundred Auxiliaries raised athis expence by Colonel Christopher Przemski, who Commanded a Polish Regiment in Flanders should be joyned to the Poles Army under the same Colonel, who out of this recruit formed one good Regiment. Kmielniski being retired with his Forces into their Winter Quarters; some great persons on the behalf of Poland begun to treat with him of Peace, but they received very very haughty answers, all the advantages of the last Campagne having rendred him more insolent then before, so that it was as much as they could doe to prevail with him to consent to a truce for some moneths.

The Præludes of a new war began on both sides before the time was expired; the Rebels forces provoked the Polish in divers places, but bore away the marks of their fool-hardiness having been worsted almost every where by Andrew Firley, Governor of Belz, and Stanislaus Landskoroniski, Governor of Camieneche, between whom the new King John Casimir, presently after his election, divided the Command of his forces, they received amongst others, very notable shocks at Zwiehal, Ostropol, Bar, and other places, which were retaken, with great destruction of the Rebels, and rich booty to the Polanders.

Kmielniski seeing that the Spring approached, which he expected with impatience patience after that he had called in the Tartars again, took the field to make a new inroad into Poland: the Polesalso gathered together to cross his defign, and their Commanders having deliberated in what place they ought to stay, till the rest of the Forces of the Kingdom were come up to them; amongst many advices, of which, one amongst others was to lodge under the Cannon of Camienesche, the importance of which Fortress being a bar against the Turks was such, that the preservation of it deserved that it should be preferred before any other consideration whatsoever; the advice of Firley prevailed, who judging it not fit to draw off the Army from the frontiers, lest they should be exposed to the irruption of the Enemy, made choice of the Town of Zbaras, belonging to the Duke Wisnowitski, as a place most convenient for his design, and for the reception of those recruits which they expected, he had no more then nine thousand men with him, taking in those Troops which some Noble-men had raised raised at their own expences, he had with him amongst other Commanders, Landskoronski, the Count of Ostorog, Great Cup-bearer to the Crown, joyned with him as Colleagues; Duke Demetrius, feremiah Michael Wisnowitski, and Alexander Koniespolski, Great Enfigne to the Crown, Son of the defunct Great General of the same name. General Firley foreseeing that he should soon be environed with an Army almost innumerable, did presently furnish himself with provisions, and repaired the old Fortifications as well of the Town as of the Castle of Zbaras, and secured his Camp by a good intrenchment flancked with Forts and Redoubts, and taking a particular care of a certain Lake which furnished him abundantly with water, that it might by no means be turned away by the enemy. He was no fooner intrenched, but the Army of the Tartars and Cossacks came and encompassed them in on all sides in such numbers, that there have been seldom seen the like forces together, since those of Attiluand Tamberlan; and that which was never known before, the Cham himself was there in person, thinking to swallow up the Kingdom of Poland as a prey, which could not escape him, and which Kmielniski did not fail to make him believe infallibly his own; so that he made so little esteem of this handful of Polish Soldiers, which were the onely forces which appeared then to defend the Frontiers; that he resolved not to take them by Famine, but to force their Camp, which he thought he might so much the more easily execute by reason that the number of his Army was such, that he had no need to be sparing of his Men.

He made a General Assault upon the 13 of July, 1649. which was very furious, and he himself at the Head of his Forces 3 who not understanding well the danger, and unacquainted with the Polish valor, rushed on desperately to this Attack; the cheif assault was made upon the Quarters of General Firley, as most of all exposed. Those that assaulted them, were under covert by the convenience of a Neighboring Valley: So that some of them, who had already forced the intrenchment, were beaten off with great difficulty. Firley and Prince Wisnowitski defended themselves valiantly; the latter seeing his Men begin to give way. prohibited them by his command shooting any longer against the Tartars, whom he gave out to have promised Peace and Friendship to their Generals; and by this Artifice, encouraged and perswaded his Soldiers so far, that they supposing now they had onely the Cossacks to deal withal, had new vigor infused into them, and after having slain a great number, repulsed the rest astonished at their desperate bravery, having now sustained that same day seventeen assaults.

The Cossacks renewed them again the following days, but still with less success, although they joyned stratagems to force, for to make the Polanders think that they had received new Forces from the Turks, they habited divers of their own after the Turkish manner, who conducted a Party of Horse the same way habited, but were really onely Turkish Vests stuffed with Straw, and set on Horsback. But the manner of this deceit was easily discovered to the Polanders by their Perspective Glasses.

Kmielniski sent in Letters often, in some of which he exhorted Firley to an accommodation; in others, he sollicited the German Troops to desert them; but sinding that he prevailed nothing, either by sorce or art, he thought upon attacking the Polish Camp by approaches, and imployed the revolted Peasants who were in great number in his Army, to work in them day and night; so that in sew days he advanced them to the very soot of their Intrenchment.

This new attempt of the Cossacks, troubled the Poles more then the former, and seeing that they were now that up closer, and that it would be difficult difficult for them to maintain their first intrenchment, they made others nearer to the Town: Into which, they retired themselves as soon as they were perfected, and divers, even of the Officers themselves, were of opinion, that they should quit all that was without, and shut themselves up into the place; but this advice appearing very dangerous, was not followed. But besides the extremity they were reduced to, in having scarce any space left them to stir in, their Provision began to be scarce, and their Provender for their Horses; So that they dying every day in heaps, caused an unsupportable stink in the Camp. A morsel of Bread was fold for Ten Poltoracks, and a Tun of Beer for Fifty Florins. The Soldiers lived upon no other Pro-English. A Florin vision, then the Flesh of Dogs and Horses. Kmielniski knowing in what condition the besieged were, became more insolent, and would grant them no terms but what were very hard. The Chamshewed himself more courteous, yet having demanded that Wisno-witski and Koniespolski should come and confer with him. And the Polandders refusing that these great persons should put themselves into his hands, he was very much offended. The Polists Generals might well send Messengers to the King of Poland, to lethim know in what extremity they were, and to defire a speedy relief; for most of them fell into the hands of the Cossacks or Tartars; and if any one escaped in their going out, yet they received no answer, they being either killed or taken prisoners in their return. Howsoever the Generals pretended, that from time to time they received news from His Majesty of Poland; and that he would speedily come to relieve them; and that it might be the more firmly believed, they affixed the Kings Seal to the Letters which they feigned, having taken it off from other Letters which they had formerly received. Thus they encouraged the besieged Army, and induced them to have Patience, both by the artifice and sweetness of their Discourse.

Some

Some, even of the Principal Officers, who had provisions sufficient for themselves, left their good Meals which they might have made, and betook themselves to eat stinking Horseflesh and Dogs-flesh, to make these unsavory Dishes be better relished by their Soldiers. Firley, although he were infirm, by reason of his years and maladies, would have made use of the same fare, had he not been often hindred by those who were about him. Wisnowitski and Koniespolski neglected not in the mean time, frequently to fally out upon the besiegers, to put them out of hopes of any speedy victory over people, who still preserved so much vigor and resolution, in the middle of those miseries, which they suffered; but besides, the scarcity of Victuals, their want of sieged being advertised of their design, Ammunition hindred them from shooting so frequently as before. And the effectual, received them briskly, and Cossacks were no ways negligent on their made a great slaughter. Things were part; for besides their continual shoot- in this posture, when an Arrow shot infrequent assaults, they made approach- fortunately a Letter tied to it 3 by es against the Town; and attempted to cut off the Water from the belieged. But these designs not succeeding, they contrived to set the Town of Zbaras on fire, and cheifly one of its Gates, which did very much incommodate them, it being higher then the rest, and the best marks-men of the Poles shot from thence without ceasing; amongst whom Captain Butler did marvellous execution, and Father Muchaveski, a Jesuite, no less; who from the Gate of the Castle killed no less then two hundred Cossacks for his part.

A great company of the Rebels came up to the Gate with Firebrands in their Hands, ready to let it on fire: Having obtained which, it was very probable they would gain the rest; but the beprepared themselves to render it ining against the Polish Camp, and their to the Town, brought with it most which

which he who wrote it, although his name were never known, gave them to understand he was a Gentleman; and first excused himself, for serving under the Cossacks; to which he was induced by the outrages which he had received from a certain great person; and by the turn of the Fortune of the Poles the year before, but yet that he had not for all that, lost his love and zeal for his Countrey, as he had testified to them in three other Letters, which he had sent to them in the same manner; and did now give them notice, that the King was certainly coming to their relief, and already arrived at Zborow, that the Cossacks being informed of his coming, would not fail to redouble their assaults against them; but for the same reason they ought to redouble their courage, and prepare themselves to repulse them with their utmost vigor.

The most part of the besieged could not put any considence in this Letter, supposing it to be a new invention of the the Generals: But foon after it was found to be true, and that the King was advanced as far as Zborow to deliver his belieged Forces, having furmounted all those obstacles which might retard his preparations, and his march. True it is, that his Army was thought by the most intelligent, not onely insufficient to confront that terrible number of enemies which he went against, but even to sustain the least Onset from them, it consisting in all, but of Fifteen thousand Soldiers in pay, and Five thousand others raised by the Nobility at their own charge, the rest not being able to come so soon, having been too flow in their Levies; notwithstanding the continual instances of the King, and his earnest diligence in this affair.

Kmielniski and the Chamunderstanding of the march of the King of Poland, divided their Forces, and leaving Forty thousand Tartars; with a great number of the Cossacks, and revolted Peasants before Zbaras; with the rest of their their forces marched towards Zborow. and were not discovered by the Kings forces, either by reason that the King had sent none out to inform himself, or that the Countrymen thereabouts, more inclined to favor the Cossacks, as being of the same Religion with them, had not faithfully reported what they knew of it; insomuch, that the Cossacks and Tartars arrived at the Kings Camp without being any ways discovered, being assisted therein by the Woods, the thick Mists, and the negligence of their enemy. Nay, Kmielniski himself found means to enter into the Town of zborow, and there to consider at his leifure the posture of the Polish Army. And no sooner were the Poles gotten over the Causeys and Bridges, which are in the Marshes about the Town, and began to put themselves in order, but they found that they were on a fudden charged by the Cossacks and Tartars.

The fight began about the Baggage, the Tartars came soon after and fell upon upon the back of the Kings Forces, having crossed a Water; where the Peasants by a remarkable Treachery, had broken down a Causey which kept it up, and so rendred it fordable to the Insidels. The Nobility of Premission, and the Cavalry of the Duke of Ostrog sustained the sirst Onset; but being not able to resist the great numbers of their enemies, many of that Nobility were lost, and all their Baggage.

Stanislaus Wituski and Leon Sapicha Vice-Chancellor of Lithuania, coming to their relief, repulsed the Tartars for a time; but these returning with more impetuolity against the Troops of the Vice-Chancellor, they must now have been suppressed after a contest of six hours, if that the Governor of sendomire, and Baldovin Ossolinski Starroste of Stabnitz, had not given the Infidels a diversion. In which, Offolinski and divers Gentlemen of the Palatinate of Russia were slain; while this passed in the Rear and Flanks of the Polish Army, Kmielniski with his Cossacks, and. and a Party of Tartars attacked the Front. The King who at the first noise, of their arrival, had put his Forces into Batalia, gave the Leading of the Right Wing to the Great Chancellor Osolinski. This Wing was composed of the Cavalry of the King; and of that of the Palatines of Podolia, Beltz, and Enhoss Scarroste of Sokal, and other Regiments: And ordered the Lest Wing to be commanded by George Lubomirski, Starroste of Cracovia, and the Duke Coreski; where besides the Regiments of Horse were divers Companies of Voluntiers.

The Main Battel made up of the Infantry, and where the King himself was in Person, was commanded by Major General Hubald of Misnia, who had served a long time in the German Wars, and had afterwards commanded the Militia of Dantzick; and by one Wolff a Gentleman of Liesland, Governor of Cracovia; both which had their German Regiments with them.

The Tartars extending themselves wide beforethe Vant-guard, as if they came onely to observe them, after they had closed of a suddain after their manner of fighting, threw themselves upon the right wing, where they were received bravely, and finding that the Foot were defended with their Pikes, and not in a condition to be broken up, they passed to the left wing, which they were able to shake more then the other, Coreski who was at the head of them, had his Horse shot from under him. Ruzouski was wounded with an Arrow through the Cheeks, yet did not neglect with the Arrow sticking still in the wound, to goe and advertife the King of the danger wherein the left wing was, his Majesty of Poland not regarding the Dignity of his perfon, ran in all haste to encourage his soldiers by his presence, bringing them on again which were flying away, and complaining that he had no more Officers to Command them; yet notwithstanding he himself would take their place, place, and he had been insenbly ingaged in the hottest of the battel, if those about him had not detained him. The presence of the King who exposed himself in this manner for their safety, did reanimate, his soldiers as much as the dreadful number of their enemies had discouraged and astonished them, and afterwards they fought with more heat, nor would be forced to give ground.

Some Tartars having broken in on one side were repulsed again by the discharge of their Cannon, and by two Companies of Foot Commanded by Ghiza, Captain in the Kings Guards, and in the end the Enemy not being able to get any advantage over them answerable to those great endeavors against the Polish Army, the night coming on, terminated that days engagement, in which in all likelihood they were to have been cut in pieces; most of the night was spent in consulting and giving Order how to receive the Enemy the next day, they made some intrenchments in haste to defend themselves by, and in others they placed their Baggage, but while the King was consulting with the principal Commanders and Nobility, a report was spread through the Camp, that his Majesty had a design to retreat that night with most part of his.

The extream danger into which affairs were brought, rendered the report of this Retreat more probable, and it wanted little, but the same consternation had happened there as before at Pilancze. The King who was just retired to repose himself a little being informed of it, got presently on horseback, and riding up and down through the Camp, undeceived them, and by his presence shewed how vain the impression was, they had received of his retreat, of which he did declare he never so much as thought of, but was resolved to stand it out against the Enemy, putting them in hopes of a favourable success in the next days undertaking. Amongst the proposals at the Council of War upon the prefent sent conjuncture of affairs, that of attempting to disingage Kmielniski from the Cham, was most approved of, and therefore a Tartar prisoner was sent with a Letter from his Majesty, in which he gave him to understand, that he could not believe that he had lost all sense and memory of those favours which he had received from King Vladistaus, from whom when he was formerly taken prisoner in Poland, he had received so favourable an entertainment and his liberty, and to whose bounty he was beholden for his prefent Dignity, and that after this it was strange he should associate himself with Rebels and Slaves, but that he ought not to promise himself any great advantages from so unjust a confederation. Since God would give no bleffing on such designs; in the mean time his Majesty thought it convenient to put him in mind of the obligation which he had to the King his predecessor, and withal to offer him his own friendship, if so be that he esteemed that more then an Alliance with Rebels; theanfwer

Iwer of this Letter was not so suddenly received, and the next day morning, so soon as it was day, the Army of the Cossacks and Tartars appeared in Batalia, the first against the City of Zborow, and the latter fell upon the Baggage.

Four hundred light Horse were able for some time to amuse the Coslacks with divers skirmishes, and afterwards being sustained by a greater number, they drove them off beyond the Town, and those who did attend the baggage having taken Arms, preserved it against the Tartars.

The enemies afterwards divided themselves into three bodies, and at as many places attacked the Kings Camp, after having first of all seized upon a Church which did Command it, where having planted a Battery by their continual shooting from which they had forced many who defended it to retire; they had almost made themselves Masters of it, and one of their their most resolute soldiers had already planted Colours upon the Works, when that a great body of the Kings party running together, made so brave a resistance, that the enemy did not onely give over the assault but the fight, the servants sallied out to pursue them, and shewed such courage upon this occasion, that some proposed they should have Horses given them, and be ordered into Troops to increase the number of their forces, and being reinforced with this supply drawn from the Army it self, they might then hazard a Battel, others were of the opinion, that it could not be expedient to venture so far, seeing that after a defeat they would necessarily be reduced to the same extremity as those at Zbaras, out of this diversity and incertainty of Council, wherein the Poles then floated, knowing not which way to steer, it pleased providence to conduct them happily to their Port. The Cham who before all these assaults upon both the Polish Armies, had promised himself a speedy and certain victory, and now finding to the contrary, so much fearless resolution among them, began to be weary of this war, and to shew himself more inclined towards an accommodation, wrote a civil answer to the Kings Letter, in which he acknowledged himself obliged to the Crown of Poland; and that if his Majesty after his Election had applied himself to him, he would have set a greater value on his friendship, and embraced it sooner then the interest of the Cossacks, but they had neglected it so much, that they scarce considered him as an ordinary man, although they might well perceive how advantagious his friendship might be, and now seeing there was an occasion of renewing their antient Alliance, he would not be backward on his side, but promised to oblige the Cossacks to lay down their Arms and to return to their obedience, provided that the Articles of the former Treaties were observed; and that if his Majesty desired to name a place to confer in, and fend his Chancellor thither, he would send his Vizier.

zier. This Letter was also accompanied with one from Kmielniski, full of respect, and in which he assured the King of his fidelity and future services.

The Conference being accepted of by his Majesty of Poland, and the place appointed between both the Armies, The Vizier and the Great Chancellor Offolinski, met according to appointment. The Vizier demanded that they should pay the pension which they were accustomed to give the Cham for the services which he was bound to render to Poland, which King Vladislaus had refused to pay; that they should satisfy the Zaporouski Cossacks, and for the dammages and expenses which the Tartars had been at in this expedition, and the blood they had lost, it should be permitted them to make their excurfions and plunder the Countrey in their return, in the mean time there was a suspension of Arms granted though interrupted by some hostilities; the next day which was the seventeenth of August the Plenipotentiaries returned to the same place of Conference, each accompanied with two others. The Chancellor of Poland took with him the Palatine of Kiovia, and the Vice-Chancellor of Lithuania. The Visier brought Sieferkaz and Sulimaz Aga, to whom Kmielniski was joyned, to desire a Bill of Oblivion for himself. His Cossacks, and the revolted Peasants, and that they should provide for the maintenance of their Liberty, and the Greek Religion; and after divers contests, the Peace was concluded the same day with the Cossacks and Tartars, upon these Conditions.

I. Hat there should be Peace and Brotherly friendship for the future between John Casimir, King of Poland; as also the Kings His Successors, and Islan Gierey, Cham of Tartary, and the whole Family of the Giereys.

II. That the King should freely pay the ordinary Pension of the Tartars, sending it to Camienesche, by Deputies appointed thereto.

III. That in consideration of this, the Cham should be bound to assist the King with all his Forces against any Enemy, as often as it should be required.

IV. That the Cham should secure the Frontiers of Poland, from the Incursions and Robberies of his Subjects.

V. That the rest of his Forces before Zbaras should immediately dislodge, and let the Polish Army, which was there, march with all liberty to any place where it should please His Majesty of Poland to command them.

VI. That the Cham should without any delay, leave the Countreys and Dominions belonging to the King; and all his Forces the same, and those Turks which he had with him.

VII. That the King, in consideration of the Cham, would grant a General Pardon to Kmielniski and his Army, and reestablish the Cossackian Militia in its ancient Form, Number, and Liberty.

VIII. Besides these Conditions, Three hundred thousand Florins were promised to the Cham, of which, he received an Hundred thousand in ready Money.

The Articles agreed on with Kmielniski imported thus much, that

I. I Irst, the King should grant a General Bill of Oblivion to all the Cossacks, and Rebellious Peasants; and that what was passed should be no more looked after, then as if it had not been done.

I T. That Kmielniski should fall down and ask Pardon of His Majesty upon his knees.

III. That he should be continued General of the Cossacks; of which, the number should be increased to Forty thousand; and and in which quality, he should depend on none but the King, after he had made his acknowledgment as a Polish Gentleman in regard of the States.

IV. That His Majesty should have a List of the Names and Habitations of the Said Forty thousand Cossacks, and that upon the death of Kmielniski they should be commanded by one of their own Officers of the Greek Religion.

should be always given to a Greek.

VIII. That the Metropolitan of the Greeks should have his Seat in the Senate among the Bishops, and should have the nineth place.

XI. That the Nobility coming again into the possession of their Estates, should not enquire after, or trouble their Subjects for the damages which they might have received during the War.

XII. That those Noblemen, whether Catholicks or Greeks, who had taken part with the General of the Cossacks should not be at all molested, but discharged from all what had passed in the last Wars. In In execution of which Articles, the General coming before the King fell upon his knees, and with tears in his eyes, made a long discourse, expressing himself how he had much rather appeared in his presence, to receive his approbation for some confiderable service done to his Majesty, and the State, then thus stained with so much Blood. But since that the destinies had disposed it otherwise, he came to implore his clemency; and in all humility, the forgiveness of his faults, promising to repair them by his future conduct. The King answered him by the Vicechancellor of Lithuania, That the Repentance of his Subjects was more acceptable to him, then their punishment; and that he did heartily forgive what was passed, if he would efface the crime which he had committed by his future Zeal and Fidelity to his Countrey.

After this action, Kmielniski and the Cham caused their Forces to retire, and the King extreamly happy in escaping fo great a danger, at so easie a rate, went with the Polish Army to Gliniani, and afterwards to Leopold.

Those Forces intrenched at Zbaras, reduced to those extremities which you have already heard of, maintained themselves all along, rather by rage and despair, then any hope of help.

The Inhabitants of that Town, not being able to suffer the utmost extremity of Famine, were ready either to burn the Town, or deliver it up to the enemy; but the vigilance of the Polanders having hindred the execution of this tragick design, they much sollicited to be let out, which was onely granted to their Wives and Children; neither were they able to keep their retreat undiscovered, but fell first into the hands of the Polish Soldiers, who abused them as they pleased, and afterwards of the Tartars, who led this unfortunate Troop into captivity together with some Servants of the Army who had followed them.

The

The One and twentieth of August, the Cossacks sent the first news to the besieged of the Peace concluded at zborow, which was believed by some, but called in question by most, who feared they might not be comprehended in that Treaty; they were confirmed in this opinion by a Trumpet, who had the boldness to proclaim the same upon his own accord; and it had cost him his life, if one of the Generals had not interceded for him: Afterwards there came a Letter from Kmielniski, in which, he affured the besieged of their Deliverance upon the payment of a certain sum to the Tartars; but the Generals would not accept of this condition, and openly declared, that fince Kmielniski was obliged to draw off his Forces, he ought to do it; and for the Tartars, if they would remain where they were, they might do so if they pleased. In the end, a more faithful and joyful Message was brought them, with a Letter by Colonel Minor from the King, to affure them of their Liberties withwithout any conditions, together with the disposal of the Palatinate of Seudomire, vacant by the Death of the Duke of Zaslaw, with which his Majesty would gratiste the services of General Firley. The Prince Wisnowitskie was presented with the stageofty of Premissi, the Duke of Ostrog with that of Nessewitz, Landskoronski with that of Stobnitz, and the Palatinate of Braclaw.

All these recompenses, although very considerable, yet were they inserior to that valor and heroical Constancy; of which, all these great persons had given such fair proofs, during those two Moneths which they were besieged, and continually assaulted in Zbaras.

Neither was Providence less favorable to the Polanders in Lithuania, then in Russia, where two of their Armies were, as it were, led by the hand out of a danger; wherein according to all humane appearance, they must have perished.

The Rebellion of the Cossacks and Peasants spred it self in the beginning of the War, with so much more ease into Lithuania, by reason that the Inhabitants of that Countrey, are more conformable in their Manners and Religion with the Russes.

The Cossacks, entring at two places, had made their inrodes into Polesia, a Countrey full of Woods and Bogs, and which makes a part of the Palatinates of Kiovia and Volhinia, and by treachery had seised upon the Inhabitants of Starodub and Homel, people who had favored their irruption. Colonel Patz and Volowitz, and afterward Prince Janus Radzevil, General of Samogitia, and Field-Marshal of Lithuania, oppofed their designs as well as they could, with the Nobility of Orsa; the Garrifon of Bichova, and some other Forces gathered together; but the affistance of the State came very flowly, and Prince Radzevil being sent for to the Diet. The Rebels made use of this occasion of his absence, and set upon sluczk, a Town belonging to Prince Bogistans Radzevil, Great Master of the Horse of Lithuania. Sosnowski, who was Governor of it, defended it bravely against them; and Horsch, Governor of Orfa, defeated Fifteen hundred Men at Czeresko, and Mirski, Major General of the Lithuanian Army, retook from them Prinsko, a populous Town, and the Seat of a Greek Bishop, which they had made themselves Masters of, by the treachery of the Inhabitants. Hladki one of the Principal Commanders of the Cossacks, who was within to defend it, was slain; and because this place was one of their principal retreats, it was facked and burnt to ashes to serve for an example.

Prince Radzevil returning from the Election of the King of Poland, although the season of the year was very unfit for War; after that he had reduced onely by the same of his approach, the Towns of Turow and Grodek, went and laid down before Mozyr, which being being defended for some days very obstinately, was taken by storm by Ganskowski, Lieutenant Colonel in Radzevil's Regiment, and Michnenko, one of the chief of the Rebels, being taken therein, the Prince commanded he should be beheaded by the Common Hangman, and his Head set upon the top of the Castle.

From thence he marched with his Forces towards the River Berezina, where he attacked Bobroisko; the Inhabitants were received into grace, upon condition, That they would deliver up their Arms; and those among them, who had been the Authors of this Insurrection, or who had made a League with the Cossacks; which coming to the knowledge of those who were to be delivered up, they retreated into a Tower, and fet it on fire, preferring this voluntary death, before that with which the Conqueror threatned them. Produbitz who commanded them, received with the rest the punishment of his Rebellion. The

The Winter and the Truce put a stop to the War in Lithuania, as well as in Poland for some Moneths; but in the Spring, Kmielniski entring into the Kingdomagain, sent into this Province Helia Holota to renew the War with Ten thousand Men, to whom many Rebellious Peasants were to joyn them-This General thought to furprise part of the Lithuanian Army in their Winter-quarters at Zahal, upon the River of Pripecz; but Radzevil's Forces gathering together in haste put them to flight, and drove them into a Marsh, where he and his Army perished. Stephen Podobaylo was substituted in his place by Kmielniski, who gave him order to intrench himself between the Boristhenes, and the River of Zula, which he did, and let fire on Loiowogrod, least it should serve for a place of retreat to the Lithuanians: Yet Gozieuski setting forward with some Troops to oppose his designs, having sent some Foot down the Boristhenes, seised on a place capable of incommodating him very very much. After this Kmielniski sent again into Lithuania Thirty thousand Men, under the Command of Crziezeus-ki, a Polish Gentleman.

This Commander had procured Kmielniski liberty, when he had been taken by the Poles, and had received the same favor from him again; the last year, after the defeat of the Polish Army at Carsun, and the favorable entertainment he received, together with the fortunate posture of Kmielniski's affairs, engaged him in his service. Being therefore entred into Lithuania, after he had passed the Pripecz, he made as if he would besiege Rzeczicza, a Town very advantagiously seated; but marched directly against Prince Radzevil's Army, imaging upon the advice that was given him, That this Prince had sent out some Regiments, he might easily force the rest, and came very near before they had news of his march. But Chodorkowitz went out with some Horse, at the first noise of them, and being backed with Four hundred Foot, commanded by Podlek and Juskiewitz, he opposed himself against the first Onset of the Cossacks; and receiving divers charges from them, the rest of the Troops had leisure to put themselves in Bataglia: And at length Gonziewski and Niewarowitz, with the Hussians forced the Lest-wing of the Enemy into a Wood, where at first they made a great firing, and overthrew divers who advanced too far; but at last, being constrained to retreat farther in, they were not in condition to fight any longer.

In the mean time, some Squadrons, which the heat of the engagement had drawn out too far, were incompassed in by the Cossacks, and ready to be cut in pieces, if that Komorouski, whom Prince Radzevil had sent before with a thousand Men to discover and take prisoners, had not happily come in and disingaged them. He that commanded the Right-wing of the Cossacks, seeing this Recruit, and apprehending that it might be followed by a greater, and that that some Ambush was preparing for him retreated also into the Wood, and wherein he thought himself not secure enough, till he had intrenched himself. While these things were doing, the Cossackian General Podobailo, who was coming to the relief of Crziezewski with Twelve thousand Men, passed the Boristhenes in Boats: And it is certain, if he had arrived a little sooner, and before the other Troops had been broken, the Lithuanian Army had been in extream danger; but the Forces of Podobailo were scarce half passed over, and had begun to intrench themselves, when Prince Radzevil marched directly towards them, and after a fierce charge, put them to the rout, and drove them into the River.' So that besides Three or four hundred which saved themselves by swimming, Four thoufand five hundred of them were either killed or drowned. Colonel Tisenhausen, Nold, and Fechtman, with their Germans, fell upon the rest of Podobailo's Forces, who with their Tabor went to joyn themfelves to Crziezeuski.

This

This General coming out of the Wood, whereinhe had retreated to receive them, was presently wedged in again by the Hussars, and forced to intrench in haste with Arms of Trees broken off, or any thing that came to hand; even with dead bodies. And having understood that night by his Spies, that Prince Radzevil prepared for a new attack the next morning, he retreated in all haste; leaving the heaviest of his Baggage behind him, and he himself being wounded in many places, was left by the way, and fell into the hands of the Lithuanians, and died some time after in their Camp. Notwithstanding this shock, the War was kindled still more fiercely, and many thousand Cosfacks had passed the Pripecz at Babica, to make a new irruption into Lithuania, and to reinforce their party when the peace at Zborow was concluded. In execution of which Treaty, the Cossacks were called back out of this Country as well as out of Poland.

COSSACKS

POLAND.

He King of Poland returning to Warsam, in the midst of the Acclamations of his People, who could not sufficiently express their joy and acknowledgments to him, for what he had done for the preservation of the Kingdom; applied himself with all diligence in the Diet, which he held towards the end of the year, to the establishment of the Peace lately concluded with the Tartars and Cossacks.

H

The result of this Diet, which ended the Twelfth of January, One thousand fix hundred and fifty, was, That all the Polish Soldiers should be immediately fatisfied: That the Army which had been shur up at Zbaras, in consideration of their great services, should receive three payments extraordinary, there should be Twelve thousand Men in continual pay for the Guard of the Eventiers: That the Articles concluded on, between the King, and the Cossacks and Tartars at Zborow, should be confirmed: That three of the Cossackian Gentlemen should be admitted to Publick Offices: And that for the supply of these great expences, there should be a new Impost laid upon all Roland and Lithuania and Customs upon Merchandifes granted to his Majesty , for his Signal Exploits in the last Campagnia. បស់តាំងការសម្មេចសម្មសិន្តសត្ថសំពីក្រៅប្រកាស់ សែសមែបសី

It was also thought fit to establish a Senator at Kiovia, to be vigilant, near at hand, over the Actions of the Cossacks, and to decide the differences which might arise in performance of the Treaty. Adam Kissel, appointed a while after, to be Governor of that Town, was thought to be a person most able to acquit himself worthily in that charge, and to register the Forty thousand Men, of which the Cossackian Army was to consist, according to the last Treaty, and to give them their necessary instructions.

Kmielniski observed this Peace almost a year, and testified in all appearance his good intentions; but apprehending least the Polanders whom he had forced, in the unhappy conjuncture of their affairs, to grant him extraordinary conditions, should now repent of it, and search out ways to elude the performance of them; he thought that he could not do better then by powerful Alliances, to secure to himself these advantages which had been conceded.

And to this intent, he applied himfelf to the Grand Signior, and the Great Duke of Muscowy; but especially to the first, by whose favor he hoped to render himself considerable to all the World. He pretended also to desire the Friendship of the Hospodar or Prince of Moldavia; but it was onely to amuse him, that he might the better surprise him, and force his Countrey: For in the mean time he made an ill impression of him upon the mindes of the Grand Signiors Officers, to whom he represented him as a secret enemy to the Turks, and an intimate Friend of the Polanders; and that by his means, the Poles had hitherto received continual intelligence of theirs, and the Tartars designs. They assured therefore Kmielniski of the Protection of the Grand Signior, and that he should be invested with Black Russia, to hold it in Fee of the Ottoman Empire; they received the acknowledgments of his dependance on them, and his promises of fidelity in their service, and permitted him to execute his designs against the Prince of Moldavia, which he did with great dissimulation, and made use of the Tartars in it 5 to whom he joyned onely Four thousand Coffacks, and the better better to keep secret his intentions. The Cham sent to him to thank him for his assistance against the Circassians, and defired further, that he would lend him his Forces to go against Moscovy, to revenge the injuries which he had received from the Great Duke: So that while the Neighboring Princes perswaded themselves, that the Tartars were going to War in Moscovia, the Hospodar of Moldavia, who was one of this number, and lived in the ordinary careless security of a high Peace, found himself encompassed in with a numerous Army of Tartars, and the Four thoufand Auxiliary Cossacks. All that could be done upon so sudden and unexpected an accident, wasto run into the Woods near Jasz, his principal City. In the thickest of which, the Hospodar, with his family, and as many as he could get together in haste, intrenched themselves with Trees cut down; and afterwards drew himself out of this danger, upon the payment of Twenty thousand Ducats to the Tartars, and the promise of his Daughter in marriage to Timotheus Kmiel, Kmielniski his Son: Upon which condition Kmielniski did recede from many hard terms which he had put upon the Hospodar.

In the mean time, the Peace with the Poles was every day violated by the Cossacks; their numerous Army was extended much beyond their quarters. The Peasants who were not inrolled, sustained by them, would not receive those Gentlemen, their Landlords, who were to enter upon possession of their Estates again, but treated them ill, and massacred divers. This deportment of theirs, and the expedition against Moldavia, obliged Potoski, the Generalissimo, who was newly returned out of his prison in Tartary, to march with the Polish Army, and incamp near Camienesche.

Kmielniski was much surprised at the first news of this march; and there being with him at that time divers who were deputed from the Nobility, to complain of the Rebellion, in the which

which the Peafants perfifted, and their refusal to acknowledge them; he commanded, that all those who were sent to him, should be drowned the nightfollowing. But these Orders being given when he was in drink, filled with Wine and Strong-waters, after he had digested his debauch, and been informed by his Wife of what he had done, he presently revoked his sentence just when they who had the charge of it, were ready to execute it. Afterwards he sent Craucenski, one of his Officers, to the General Potoski, to give him to understand, That he could not but be astonished at the approach of the Polish Forces, in such a time, when they had Peace with all the World, and a powerful Army of Cossacks at their disposal for the security of the Frontiers.

The General in answer reproached him for their daily breach of Peace, and the ill Treatment which the Nobility received from their Subjects; and for the War which Kmielniski had undertaken without their knowledge H 4 against against the Prince of Moldavia; and that although he were Great General to the States of Poland, yet he ought to have advertised them of it; he added, that he could not leave that station wherein he was by the Kings Order, without express command from his Majesty.

This Answer was no way pleasing to the Envoy from Kmielniski, who declared how much his Master would be ill satisfied with it, and mingled threatnings of War with his discourse; but proceeded not to breach of Peace, either by reason of the nearness of the Polish Army, and the Great General, whose admired desert or redoubted courage, might turn him from it; or because, that the designs he laid of raising a Principality for himself, were not yet mature enough to disclose this ambitious project; or, that he was willing to fet down contented with his expedition into Moldavia, and with having made a new Alliance, although by force of Arms.

In the mean time the Nobility in Vkraine were as ill treated, as if it had been in time of War; so that many were obliged every day to retire. Those persons who had great estates, and the Duke of Wisnowitz, in particular, received scarce any Rents; the continual complaints of which to the King, induced him to write to Kmielniski, and to reproach him for the War which he had undertaken, contrary to his order, against the Hospodar of Moldavia, and for the injuries which the Nobility received, injoyning him to draw back the Zapoovian Army into their quarters, and to chastise the Peasants who had taken Arms against their Lords.

This Letter was received with great respect in appearance, but he proceeded with much slowness, to execute what the King required of him; and on the contrary, was very industrious at the same time, to make a strict League with the Turk, and Great Duke of Moscovy, whose friendship he desired with the more more importunity, by reason that he promised himself more security and advantage in his Alliance, then in the others, because of the Conformity of the Religion of the Muscovites with the Cossacks. The Great Duke approved not of this Rebellion, yet desired to make his advantage by it.

The great success which Kmielniski had had against the Poles, made him esteem them as a defeated and depressed people, and to begin a causless quarrel with them, in hopes to obtain from them, during the bad condition of their affairs, a revocation of the Treaty, which he had been forced to make with King Vladislaus before smolenko, when his whole Army was disarmed and taken which belieged that Fortress: He demanded also, in satisfaction for the affronts done him by some of the Polish Nobility, and among others, by Prince Witnowitski and Koniespolski; who had not onely neglected to give him all his titles, but had also written in terms injurious to the reputation of the Moscovite Nation; that the States of Poland should give up to him the City of smolenske with its dependances, and should pay him the sum of an Hundred and fourscore thousand Ducats. VVhereupon his Majesty of Poland having sent a Gentleman, named Barlinski, to the Great Duke, to be more clearly informed concerning the insolent demands of his Ambassador; upon whom, in the mean time, he had set a Guard. This Envoy brought back an Answer, which testified rather the inclination the Moscovite had to observe the former Treaties with Poland, then to come to a breach; and in effect, although the Great Duke would with much joy have seen the increase of the Greek Religion, yet he could not look with a good eye upon the growing greatness of Kmielniski, nor be without some apprehension, that the Rebellion of the Cossacks and Peasants, might also spred it self into his own Countrey, whither already some sparks had flown of that fire which had burned Poland. So that the Moscovite Ambassador was forced to declare in the presence of the King, and the Senators, That he, of his own head, had prepared those Propositions which he had delivered, and the Peace was confirmed between the Poles, and the Great Duke.

The continual correspondence which Kmielniski held with the Turks, of which, the King of Poland was advertised by the Neighboring Princes, and his insolent carriage towards the State, obliged his Majesty to call a General Diet of the Kingdom, in the end of the year One thousand six hundred and fifty; in which, this Prince represented the insupportable behavior of the General of the Cossacks; the contempt he had both of the King and State; the injuries which many of the Nobility had received; the loss of their Estates, and their not being able to be restored against Kmielniski his great forces, which he strove to increase by the addition of Tartars and Turks; so that he was in a condition to gather together on the suddain, an Army of more then Fourfcore score thousand Men, every Cossack inrolled, of which, the number by the last Treaty, amounted to Forty thousand; had a servant on Horsback, and another on Foot, besides a Laborer to Till the Grounds; that their design was to shake off utterly all obedience, and to set up a new Government under the Protection of the Grand Signior: So that they would be capable of performing any thing, if that they did not soon put a stop to the course of their pernicious designs.

There were some in the Assembly, who calling to minde the evils, caused by the last VVar, were of opinion, That Peace at any rate was to be preferred before it; and alledged, that the Forces of the Kingdom were now notably decreased, whereas those of the cossacks were very powerful, both of themselves, and by the assistance of the ottoman family which protected them; so that it would be much better to keep close to the Treaty of Zborow: But the greater number making reslections upon what was passed, and what was to be expected, considered that there were but two ways to be taken; the one to ruine the Cossacks, or, the other to let the Kingdom perish miserably; that the King had onely a title and precarious authority over them, no more then they pleased themselves; that they were now upon the design of forming a Principality, from whence they were to expect most dismal events, if they gave them time to increase and establish themselves; that they interpreted the Treaty after their own manner, and gave it what sence they pleased 3 that the State had yet considerable Forces, if they were well imployed; and that as affairs then stood, they were better able to give a stop to their new and rising power, then they could afterwards refift them, when they were raised, fortified, and established by time; that the King was brave and active, and with small Armies having done great exploits, he would obtain more fignal advantages over his enemies, when the States should proceed to a more vigorous and powerful undertaking. These

These Reasons, but much more the new demands of the Cossacks at the same time, caused all the rest of the Diet to be of this opinion, and unanimously to resolve of a VVar against them.

The Cossacks Demands were these, That according to the Articles of the Peace at Zborow, the Union of the Greeks and Roman Catholicks should be abolished, that Kmielniski should remain Soveraign beyond the Boristhenes; that none of the Nobility or Gentry of Poland should for the future, have any power over the Pealants of that Province; that if the Gentlemen would live there, they should be obliged to work as well as the Pealants 5 that Nine Bishops should swear in full Senate to see all this observed 5 that for Hostages they should give up four Palatines to Kmielniski which he should chuse, in consideration of which Articleshe promised to pay to the King of Poland yearly a Million of Florins, and afterwards they reduced their Demands to Four.

on of a Countrey, wherein they might live without any Communication with the Poles.

2. That His Majesty and Twelve of the Principal Senators of the Kingdom should bind themselves by Oath always to observe the Peace of Zborow.

3. That for their greater security, three of these senators should remain with their General.

4. That their should be no further Union of the Roman and Greek Churches.

But all these Demands being very exorbitant, and no body willing to trust to the Faith of a Man, who was not contented with the promise which the King and State had given him, by their Confirmation of the Treaty of Zborow, at the last Diet; they had no other thoughts but of making VVar. To perform which the more advantagiously, they resolved to raise Fifty thousand Soldiers, to whom were to be joyned the Auxiliaries of the Noblemen and their Attendants, in case of need; and many thought it fit, that the Auxiliaries should be spared, as a party reserved against the last extremities; and that it were better to augment the number of the Soldiers to be raised. It was proposed also, that the War should be begun before the Spring, to hinder the Cossacks from making their due preparations, and to come at them with the more facility, while the Rivers and Marshes were yet frozen; in which, they ordinarily secure themselves in their Marches, and in their Incampings. Besides which, they could not, but with great difficulty be affisted either by the Turks or Tartars; the former not being accustomed to so rigorous a cold, and the latter would scarcefinde Forrage in this season for their Horses. But this project could not immediately be put in execution, the Forces which were ordered by the Diet, could not so soon be raised; so that the King sent onely the Field Marshal Calinouski to cover and defend the Frontiers from the asfault of the Cossacks, if they should refolve

General Potoski was gathering together his Forces about sokal. This Prince being arrived at Lublin, was informed of the irruption of the Cossacks into Podolia, and the Confederation between the Grand Seignior and Kmielniski, and that the Emperor had sent an Ambassador to Constantinople; so that he saw himself obliged to use his utmost endeavors, and to Summon all his Auxiliaries

Kalinowski who was retreated from Bar to Kamienecz, having received orders to come with all diligence towards the Army. After that he had left a sufficient garison for the defence of that Fortress, which was a place of so great importance to Poland, and all Christendom, was followed in his march by Eighteen thousand Cossacks and Two thousand Tartars; while the rest of their Forces which amounted to more then Three-score and ten thousand Men, resolved to attack Kamienecz, without the order or knowledge of their General. And having taken the Castle of Panocze near to it, by composition, where they got confiderable booty. They made many assaults upon this Fortress, but all in vain, being continually repulsed with so great a loss, that they were ready to cut their Officers in pieces, who had exposed them to so dangerous an enterprise, without acquainting Kmielniski with it; who so soon as he knew it, sent them orders to remove. Those who were bent upon the pursuit of the Forces of Kalinouski, had not much better success in setting upon them, fometimes in the Front, fometimes in the Flank, and sometimes in the Rear; being always repulsed with great valor by the General, although with the loss of many of his own. Upon the Fourteenth of May, 1651. they set upon Zobieski his Regiment, but were so received, that they left many behinde them; and amongst others Canowiecz, one of their Colonels, and a Tartarian Murza. At length Kalinouski was constrained by reason reason of the difficult Passages, and the bad ways, to leave his Carriages. To repair which loss, and to make his Army appear more numerous to the enemy, he set the Servants upon those Horses which drew the Baggage; and after having sustained many assaults, and escaped the many difficulties and inconveniences of the March, he arrived most fortunately at the Camp Royal, in the end of May.

The Forces raised at the expence of the States, and by the Noblemen came in daily from all parts, there were reckoned Ten thousand of these latter; and the whole Army, together with the Nobility, made up an Hundred thousand fighting Men, besides the Servants, who were very numerous, and most of them furnished with Horse and Arms. This great Army not being able to subsist long in one place, without suffering the want of Provisions; after that all care possible was taken to furnish them, it was resolved, they should be employed as soon as could be. great great Council of War, which was held thereupon, and lasted a whole night; some proposed to divide the Army into two Bodies, and to send the first, consisting of the Common Soldiers, against the enemies, while his Majesty might attend the success of the War at sokallo, with the Voluntiers and Auxiliaries, for a referve against the greatest extremity: But this advise was not approved by the King, nor by many of the Principal Officers, who remonstrated that if the Army were thus divided, it might be more easily encountred and defeated by the enemies; but being all in one Body, they would not onely be in a condition to oppose, but also to overcome them. They concluded therefore to march directly towards them, by the most short and easie way, which was, that by Berestesko. The King set forward with all his Forces upon the Fifteenth of June, and sent out divers parties to hear news of the Cossacks. The Marshy, Moorish places which he was to travel through, and the great number of Carriages caused his Forces to march scatteringly. So that he thought it necessary to divide them into Ten Brigades, if we may so name a Body of Ten or twelve thousand men, of which number each was composed; hereferved the first for himself, gave the command of the second to the great General Potoski; the third to the General of the Campagne Kalinowski, Palatine of Czernihovia; the fourth to John Simon Szcavinski, Palatine of Brestch; the fifth to the Duke of Wisnowitz, Palatine of Russia; the sixth to Stanislaus Potoski, Palatine of Podolia; the seventh to the Grand Marshal of the Kingdom Lubomirski; the eighth to Stanislaus Landskoronski, Palatine of Braclaw; the nineth to the Vice-chancellor of Lithuania, Sapieha; the tenth to Koniespolski, the Great Ensign to the Crown. The Polish Army came the next day, being the Sixteenth, to Wygnanka, a place abounding in Water, and good Pasture Grounds; where they underflood by a Soldier, who had left the Cossacks Army, that Kmielniski was gone from his Camp, which lay between Z.baras

Zbaras and Wisnowitz, to go meet the Cham, whom he expected with impatience; having called for his assistance, not trusting enough in his own Forces, although he had a prodigious multitude of revolted Peasants joyned with his Cossacks, but had as yet but Six thousand Tartars with him.

The King arriving at Berestesko, of which Town, the Count of Lesno, under Chamberlain of Brzestia is Lord; he incamped near it, all along the River of ster, which washes this place on all sides, and then sent out Three thousand Horse under the command of Stemkouski and Czarneski, to be certainly informed of the enemies march, and understood by some prisoners whom they took, that the Cham was come to Kmielniski with a numerous Army, and that he had sent out parties to learn in what place and condition the Polish Army was. Upon this news, it was resolved of in a Council of War, to dislodge from Berestesko, and to place themselves at Dubno, a Town belongıng ing to the Palatine of Cracovia. The Baggage began to move, and the Army. was about to march with a resolution to encounter the Cossacks wheresoever they should oppose them, when the Duke of Wisnowitz, who was of the Guard, sent to advertise the King, that Kmielniski and the Cham were coming in all haste towards him. And the Grand General understanding by a Peasant, that the enemies promised themselves affured victory, if they could fall upon the Polish Army, intangled in the way, resolved to stay at Berestesko, and the Baggage was ordered to be brought back, which was upon the way. Scarce were they returned into the Camp, but the Scouts brought word, that the whole Army of the Cossacks and Tartars were near to Pereatin, a Village within five hundred paces; so that the Generals presently drew up the Polish Army, left the River ster on one side of them, and lined all the Wooded places near, with divers Companies of Foot, for fear of an Ambush.

The Twenty seventh of June, about night, Ten thousand Tartars drawn out from the rest, came near to the Polish Army, to take a view of it, making, as if they came to provoke them to fight. The Grand Marshal, and Grand Enlign, not being able to suffer their insolence, went out with their Regiments, by the permission of the Great General, and the assistance also of Wisnowitski his Regiment, and ingaged them along while, repulsed them, and drove them back half a League. Upon the Eight and twentieth, there was another more sierce skirmish; the Cham placed himself and his whole Army upon certain Eminencies in fight of the Poles, strengthned with some of the choice Forces of the Cossacks. The Polish Army being also drawn up in order, the Regiments of the Palatine of Brzestia and Pomerania, of the Duke Bogislaus Radzevil, and the Palatine of Witebsko with the Horse of Przemistia and Volhynia, went to set upon the Tartars, who to revenge the defeat they received the day before, tore, seeing that the Horse was backed but with a small number of Foot, they poured in upon them great numbers of Men. Landskoronski was the first who could put a stop to this torrent, neither was it done without the loss of many of his own Men, and of his Brother; and he himself was so incompassed by a great number of those Infidels, that to difingage him, there were fent out the Regiments of the Great General. of the General of the Campagne, of the Palatine of Russia, of the Grand Marshal and of Sapieba. The fight grew hot upon the arrival of this reinforcement, and many were flain on both sides; the Tartars lost about a Thousand Men, and divers prisoners of considerable note were taken, amongst others, the Secretary to the Cham. The Poles had Three hundred of theirs slain, and amongst them Casanouski, Governor of Halicz, Ossolinski, Starroste of Lublin, Nephew to the Great Chancellor deceased, Stadniski Under-Chamberlain of Sanoc, Ligeza Sword-bearer of Przemislia, Rrecziski, Captain Jourdan and.

and divers Gentlemen of the Palatinate of Lencicia; and so ended the Engagement of the Eight and twentieth of June. The Night following, having considered in their Council of War, that the Enemies design was to delay time; and to reduce the Polanders to extremities for want of Provision in a Countrey too far distant from any place whence they might draw their subsistance, they thought it better to employ their Army, while it was in its strength and vigor, and determined to give Battel the next day: The King spent most of the night at his devotions, and in ordering his affairs; so soon asit was day, he drew up his Army, without the enemies perceiving it in the least, by favor of a great Mist, which continued till Nine in the Morning. The Right Wing of the First Line was commanded by the Grand General Potoski, and under him by Landskoronski, Palatine of Braclam, Opalinski Palatine of Posnania, Lubomirski Grand Marshal of the Kingdom, Sapieha Vice-Chancellor of Lithuania, Koniespolski Grand Ensign to the Crown, the Count Vladislam of Leszno, Under-Chamberlain of Posnania, the two Zobieski's Sons to the Governor of Cracovia deceased; and some other great Persons who had raised Forces at their own expences. The Conduct of the Left Wing was committed to Kalinouski General of the Campagne, to the Dukes of Oftrog and Zaslaw, to the Palatine of Erzestya, the Duke of Wisnowitz Palatine of Russia, to Stanislaus Potoski Palatine of Podolia, to John Zamoiski, and to Colonel Enhoff of Liefland; many of which had joyned the Forces which they had raised in their own Countreys to those of the States. The King took charge of the main Body of the Army, composed of the German and Polish Foot; at the Head of which, stood the Artillery, commanded by Sigismond Priemski, who was General of it, and had been a long time Major General under the smedes in Germany. The Second Line, in the middle of which, his Majesty of Poland took his place, confifted of Horse, and was commanded amongst other other Officers, by Tyskewitz, Great Cup-bearer of Lithuania. The Body of Reserve, was commanded by Colonel Meydel, Great Master of the Game, and by Colonel Enhoff, Starroste of sokal, and was composed of the Horse of Grudzinski and Rozraceuski; and of the Foot of Prince Charles, Brother to the King, and of Koniespolski's, and Colonel Du Plessis, a Frenchman. The Baggage and Ammunition was left in the Camp, which was intrenched on one side, and defended on the other by the Town and the River. The King had left some Companies of Foot therein for a Guard, who appeared afar of much more numerous then they were, by reason of their Lances, which by the Kings Orders, the Huzzars had left to them; every one of which had a Red Penon or Little Streamer at theend; and when they were all drawn up in order, made a very fair show. The Sun dispersing the Mist, which till that time, had covered the Army, it appeared to the Enemy like a beautiful perspective on a Theatre, when the Curtain

Curtain is drawing up, who were surprised at their number and good order; notwithstanding their Army was more numerous, and covered all the Countrey as far as could be seen. The Tartars possessed themselves of divers little Hills, from whence there was an easie descent, and filled up all the space in form of an Half-Moon: They had the Cossacks on their Right Hand, opposite to the Left Wing of the Polish Army, with whom were also joyned some Squadrons of Tartars; and near to them was the Tabor of the Cossacks, composed of divers Ranks of Chariots; in the middle of which, were part of their Forces able to sustain all assaults whatsoever.

The two Armies being thus placed all the morning was spent in light skirmishes, but the King doubting lest that the intention of the enemies was to amuse them with these small combats and to set upon them the night following, when by reason of the darkness they might the better surprize them.

them, he prohibited all his Soldiers upon pain of death from stirring out of their places without order, and commanded all the Bridges to be broken down which were built over the ster. that they might not be set upon behind, and by this means to ingage his own Soldiers to perform their utmost. all hopes of escaping being cut off, and that the rest of the day might not be spent unprofitably, which was scarce sufficient for a general Battel between two such numerous Armies, he began to salute the Enemies with the Cannon at the head of his Army, and so from time to time to discharge against them as they drew nearer to those Eminencies whereon the Tartars were placed. Divers seeing the day so far spent, were of opinion that the Fight should be deferred till the next morning, but others infifted much upon the contrary, fearing lest the Cossacks might fall upon the Polish Army in the night with their Tabor, which they had extraordinarily reinforced, and might therewithal constrain them to quit their their Camp. His Majesty therefore caused the Duke of Wisnowitz to begin the charge with twelve Troops of old Soldiers, backed by the Palatine of Podolies with the Auxiliaries of the Palatinates of Cracovia, Sendomir, Lencicia, and Przemistia, the Cossacks received them briskly, and the conflict lasted near an hour, all which time the smoak and dust made them invisible to the rest of the Army; and as the Poles began to give way, they were timely affilted by fresh Forces, which the King sent them; upon whose arrival, the Cossacks were driven into their Tabor, together with the Tartars, who ingaged them upon a rising Ground. In the mean time, the King marched against the great Body of the Tartars, the Right Wing staying near a Wood side, to hinder the design of many of their enemies who were in Ambush, with intention to compass in the Polish Army in the heat of the Battel. The King kept the Artillery still before him, which Priemski caused to be discharged very opportunely, and with great success. So

So that they obliged the Tartars to leave the foot of the Hill, and by degrees made themselves masters also of the top; after they had sustained the discharges of the Janissaries Carbines, who accompanied them.

In this place His Majesty of Poland was ingreat danger of his life, having four Bullets shot from some pieces which the Tartars had by a Wood side, passing very near him, and one of them falling at his feet; but the Poles soon returned themthelike: For Otuinouski, Interpreter to his Majesty of Poland for the Turkish and Tartar Languages assuring them, that the Cham was there in perfon where they saw the great White Standard. The King ordered a piece of Cannon to be so levelled, that the first shot took one of the Principal Officers, who stood near the Cham; which disturbed and frighted him so much, that he thought not farther of any thing but retreating; that part of his Army which had been driven from the Hill, followed him also, having left fome some Squadrons behind to disguise his retreat and amuse the Polanders for some time: But they were soon put to their shifts, and the Poles pursued them a League and a half, till the Night and the swiftness of their Bacmates or Tartar Horses secured them; yet they left many in their retreat, wounded and slain, which they were used to carry off, and to burn in their march when they had leisure; esteeming it abominable to leave the dead Bodies of their Friends in the hands of Christians: They left also much of their equipage, as Vestes, Saddles, Cimitars, Chariots, and the Tent and Standard of their Cham, and his little Silver Drum, guilded over and covered with a Skin, which ferves him for a Bell.

Divers Polanders who had been Slaves to those Insidels, did here recover their Liberty, but many others were killed by them, when they saw they could not carry them away with them in their retreat, which was so hasty, that they travelled Ten French Leagues

Leagues the same day. The King after he had sent out divers Troops of Horse in pursuit of the Tartars, went with the rest of his Army against the Tabor of the Cossacks, where they were still in great numbers, and had Forty pieces of Ordnance which played continually. Kmielniski was retreated with the Tartars in hopes to engage them again to fight, but he could by no means perswade them to it; but on the contrary, was very ill treated by the Cham, and reproached as one that had cheated him, and not made known the true state of the Polish Army, but had made him believe they were not above Twenty thousand; and therefore he threatned to send him to the King of Poland, in exchange for those Murza's which were Prisoners there, and would not let him go free, till he had sent orderto Czeherin to deliver up a considerable sum of Money, and part of the Booty which he had formerly taken in Poland.

The night following the King ordered there should be a Publick Thanksgiving in the Camp, for this Victory, which cost him but Twelve hundred Men, his enemies having lost Six times as many; he passed the night in his Coach: And although it was very Rainy, he neglected not to cause the Cannon to be mounted upon the Hill, which was for saken by the Tartars, the more conveniently to beat the Tabor of the Cossacks in pieces; which notwithstanding the Rain, they had fortified with a broad deep Ditch, and lined with Muskettiers in those places where it was most weak and open, and hada Marsh behind them, which did sufficiently secure them. By reason of Kmielniski his absence, they conferred the command of their Army upon one of their Officers, called Dziadziali, a person of remarkable cruelty. They had recourse to all remedies probable to give them help, they wrote to the King, to implore his clemency, and to testifie to him the extream defire which they had for for Peace; but seeing their Arms and Pens were both together in their hands, their Prince thought of no other way, but of reducing them by force; which appeared also not difficult to accomplish, by reason they began already to fall into divisions amongst themselves. Some of the Polish Commanders were of opinion, that they should drown the Camp of the Cossacks, by making a dam and stopping the Course of the Water; but the advice to batter it down, was followed, and to this purpose they brought great Cannon from Brody, a Fortress built by the deceased Grand General Koniespolski: They made also Bridges above and below their Camp, for the better communication of the Polish Forces, and raised many Forts and Redoubts in the most eminent places, from whence they might make their Batteries.

The Fourth of July, the Cossacks surprised one of these Forts, wherein were two pieces of Ordnance and Fourscore Polanders, whose Heads they struck off K 4 with with their Sythes, Arms, which their Foot ordinarily make use of instead of Pikes. But General Hubald ran upon them, and drove them from it, and forced them to leave the Cannon which they were carrying away into their Tabor. The same day the Cossacks possessed themselves of a Hill, by which means they could the more easily seek out Forrage; but the Grand Ensign dislodged them, and brought away Five hundred of their Horses.

The fifth they came out of their Camp, in great number, in appearance as if they would give the Poles battel again, but they were driven back into their Intrenchments after a strong incounter, and the loss of Four hundred of their Men. Sokol and Piascozin, of the Polish side, were wounded in this constitution, which was attended with a continual discharge of the Artillery on both sides, and great destruction.

The Cossacks seeing themselves thus ill handled, betook themselves to stratagems, tagems, and in the night following attacked the Polish Army with all their Force; but their design was prevented first by the fall of the Rain, and then by the vigilance of the King and his Generals, who doubled their Guards. At this time Mehemet Czelebey, a Converted Tartar, who had been a long while in the service of the Great General, and had been made a Captain by him, having been fent out with a party to pursue the Tartars, returned into the Camp, bringing back prisoner with him, a Tartar of quality, named Murtasa Aga, one of the Cham's Kinred, who had been wounded at the Battel of Berestesko, and was not able to follow the rest, and had offered Fifteen thoufand Rixdollars to Czelebey for his ransom; but this Polonised Tartar, preferred his Faith and Promise which he had many years since ingaged to the Great General his Master, before all the Money and other confiderable advantages, which this great person of Tartary offered him, if he would return with him into his Countrey. He reported ed also, that he had found by the way, more then Ten thousand Tartars, either slain or wounded, which they had left behind them: An extraordinary mark of their precipitous slight, their custom being to burn them, rather then leave them in the power of their Enemies.

The Cossacks whose last design took no effect, were now more and more backed in and incommodated; their onely refuge was the passage which they kept through the Marsh; by which they went out to Forrage, and by which they might retreat. But Colonel Balaban who was placed with Tenthousand Men on the other side of the Water, began to constrain the Liberty of the Excursions; and it was determined, that more Forces should be sent on that side to hinder them altogether.

At length the Polish Artillery thundering against their Tabor, with more execution then ever, they sent out three Deputies, Kresa, Colonel of the Regiment of Czeherin, Hladki, and Percaslauski, themselves first to the Great General, who severely reproaching them for their cruelty and persidiousness, told them, That they had rendred themselves unworthy of the favor of his Majesty of Poland; and that they did not deserve to be used as Christians, after that infamous Alliance which they had made with the Turks and Tartars.

The King notwithstanding, by the advice of the Senators, admitted them to Audience under a Pavillion set upon the Hill, from whence the Tartars had been driven; where they fell down upon their faces, and presented a Letter in the name of all the Cossacks, and often begged for Mercy, Mercy, repeating this word at all the requests they made; and upon all occasions, kissing the Hands and Garments of the Senators who were there present. His Majesty of Poland having called his Counsel, answered them by the Bishop of Culm, his Great Chancellor, That although their crimes were such, that they

they ought to have made them loofe all hopes of Pardon; yet his Majesty defiring to be conformable to the Divine Goodness and Mercy, did impart his; and if they would give sufficient proofs of their true Repentance, and perfect Submission, he would pardon all what was passed, upon those conditions which they should receive in writing the next day about Eleven of the Clock. Till which time, a Cessation of Arms was granted as they defired. Cresa, their Principal Deputy, remained as an Hostage, and the other Deputies returned upon the Seventh at the hour appointed, to receive the Articles, upon which the King of Poland would grant his Pardon and Abolition of their Misdemeanors.

It was demanded by these Articles, That they should first put Twelve of their Principal Commanders in Hostage, till they could deliver up unto the King their General Kmielniski, and Wihouski bis Secretary.

2. That they should restore the Artillery, and the Ensigns which they had taken in the War.

3. That they should give up the Standard belonging to the General of their Militia, to be disposed of to whom his Majesty pleased.

4. That if they were not contented, that their number should be reduced to Twelve thousand for the Guard of the Frontiers, this Article should be referred to the next Diet.

5. That as to their Priviledges which they might pretend to, those onely should be continued to them which were granted by the deceased General Koniespolski in the year One thousand six hundred and twenty eight.

The Deputies returning to their Camp, and making known these Conditions of Peace, brought back the next day this Answer.

That as to the first Article they would promise, to do their utmost, to put the Kings hands, and would yield to the Second and third; but as for more, they could never agree to, nor hold to any other Articles, then those of the Treaty of Zborow.

The King much offended at this Answer, redoubled his Batteries and resolved absolutely to exterminate them, as they on the contrary would chuse rather to die, then to recede from that Treaty.

They answered to the discharges of the Polish Artillery, but not so often; which gave suspition that their Powder was spent: Some were so bold as to advance so near to the Polish Camp, that they heard the orders which were given to the Polish Soldiers; which being known, they were obliged to change their orders; as also, the design they had formed of giving a general assault to their Tabor: And so strongly did the Cossacks relist all the attempts of the Polanders against them, that their valor had merited extraordinary Commendations, if it had not been accompanied with with many detestable cruelties, as Fleaing alive, burning by degrees; and doing a thousand other mischeifs to the Polanders who fell into their hands. So much did the proposing of those Conditions, wherewith they were to buy their Peace, inspire them with Rage and Fury, in which they were kept on by their Popes ( for so they call their Priests) who ceased not to encourage them with the hopes of the quick return of their General, and the Tartars. But the inconveniences which they suffered, and the long absence of Kmielniski undeceiving them from the false hopes they sustained of a speedy assistance, they began to desire Peace very earnestly; their Commanders who saw that it could not be effected, but to their prejudice, resisted with all their power: And seeing that Dziadziali, whom they had substituted in the room of Kmielniski, did lend an Ear towards an accommodation, they for sook him, and set up Bohun in his place; who to signalize the beginning of his new Generalship, upon the information he received ceived that the Palatine of, Braclaw had passed the River with some Forces. to shut up those Passages which the Cos+ facks made use of to go out to Forrage, and by which, they might at last retreat; he went out with a good number of the old Cossackin Militia, and two pieces of Cannon, to drive them back, and to reinforce the Guards which they had placed in the Forts, made for the preservation of the Passage. But scarce was he out of the Camp, when as the jealousie and suspition which they had a long time harbored, That the old Soldiers and Officers had a defign to retreat and leave the rest, began now to break out, and a new raised Cossack, having published it aloud, That Bohun was gone out to this intent. The noise of it immediately spred it self throughout the Camp, and caused such a consternation, that every one began to flie in the greatest disorder.

The Ways and Causeys which they had made in the Marshes near their Camp were too straight, and many falling in, stuck fast in the Mire, although they laid their Vests, Cloaks, and other garments to draw them out. Bohun perceiving this confusion, came with his old soldiers to remedy it, but could not, and the Torrent drawing them in also along with it, they were forced to follow the example of the rest. The Palatine of Braclaw seeing the enemies Army come out of their Tabor so precipitously, could not imagine what it meant, and thinking at first that they came to fall upon him, he placed himself with the two thousand men which he had onely then with him, in a posture the most advantagious to hinder his being encompassed in, but taking more notice of the enemy a while after, he was better informed, and began to pursue them, but was stopped by the force and confusion of the rout as they saved themselves; yet he set upon them as soon as he could, being seconded by the gether, and defended themselves vali-Auxiliaries of the Palatine of Plosko, antly against the great number of those who making a review at the same time who assaulted them, and set upon them when the flight of the Cossacks began, on all sides; yet that these also might not was the nearest to pursue them; The despair, and set too little value upon rest of the Polish Army which did not their lives, the Poles offered them both expect that their enemies should be so that and any thing else they had of vasodainly routed, and consequently lue about them, but this rather incensed were not on horseback, except those them the more; and immediately they who guarded the Camp, ran streight took out of their Pockets and Girdles, to the Tabor of the Cossacks, where all their Money: or whatsoever they finding sufficient booty, they imploy had considerable, and threw it into the ed themselves about it, instead of pur-water, and after that, fought till the suing their enemies; the Cossacks lost last man, every one as it were resolving no less in this flight then twenty thou-to fight singly against the force of Pofand men, either killed by the Poland-land; and what was very remarkable, ers, or lost in the Woods, Briers, one of them held out three hours against Marshes, and Boggs; two thousandall assaults whatsoever, for having got of them retreating to a little hilla little Boat in a Pond in the Marshes, within their Tabor, not in hopes of any and covered himself with the sides of relief, but as men resolved to sell theirst, he avoided all the shot which they lives as dear as they could; when they made at him, and in answer, shot away saw themselves constrained to yield toull the Powder he had at them; and with the multitude of the Polanders, some casshis Sithe repulsed all those who attackthemselves into the River, others intoed him. A Muscovite who set upon the Boggs, and in one place threehim with the same weapon could doe hundred of them were in a body to nothing, and for all his skill hardly escaped gether scaped from being cut off by the middle, next, a Gentleman of the Countrey of Czechanou, and a German Foot-soldier seeing that the Muscovite could not accomplish his designe, went into the water up to the neck, and begun the fight again, and were received with as much vigor by the Cossack, who was now wounded with fourteen Musket Bullets, to the great astonishment of the Army, and the King of Poland himself in whose sight this was performed; the King who could not enough admire the valour of the man, called out that they should give him his life, upon condition that he would yield, to which he gave this resolute answer, that he cared not to live, but desired onely to die like a soldier, and at last was run through with a Pike by the hand of another German, who came in to reinforce the affault.

(164)

The Polanders found in the Cossacks Camp, besides a number of Women and Children, a very considerable booty, and forty pieces of Ordnance, and much much Powder, many Enfignes, and at mongst others the Standard, which the King at his election sent to Kmielniski as a mark of the confirmation of his Generalship; and another which King Vladislans sent to the Cossacks when he intended to imploy them in a war which he designed against the Muscovites; another which the Cossacks took from the Poles the last 25 of June; the Sword which the Greek Patriarch sent to Kmielniski, as an acknowledgement to him for his taking upon him to defend the Greek Church. The ornaments for a Chappel and other rich moveables of a Greek Prelate, who stiled himself Archbishop of Corinth, and was the Resident of the Patriarch with Kmielniski, heit was that most of all incouraged and kept on the Rebellion of the Cossacks and Russians, and was much against any accommodation, he was killed in his flight with an Arrow shot by a young man a Polander. They found also Kmielniski his Cabinet, wherein was the Seal of the Zaporovian Army, and divers Letters from the Grand Signior,

the Great Duke of Muscovy, and the Prince of Transylvania, with about thirty thousand Rixdollars, which were designed for the Tartars; Vests lined with rich Furrs, Arms in great number, and Provision in abundance; and even the Pots and Spits at the fire, a signe that their slight was not at all premeditated.

This defeat cost the Poles not many men, and but one Captain of Radzevil his Regiment of Foot, who was sain at the attacquing of the three hundred Cossacks who retired into the Marsh. Besides those who were already sent to pursue the Cossacks; the General of the Campagnia and the Duke of Wisnowitz with seven Regiments were Commanded out to hinder them from rallying, who killed all they overtook, a great number of them attempting to retreat by Dubno, three thousand were cut in pieces by the Garrison of that Town, and divers others as they passed over a long The King leaving almost all Cauley. the the Auxiliaries at Berestesko, marched also in pursuit of them towards Krzmienecz; but found in all that journey nothing but spectacles of horror, the ways being strewed with dead bodies, and the Woods filled with those miserable persons, who after their defeat, fled into the thickest part of them, where they found no other sustenance for many days, than the Barks of Trees, and most of them were so weak, that their Legs were not able to serve them in their flight; the indignation of the Polanders at length was changed into pity at the fight of these Skeletons, and instead of pursuing them to destroy them, they did it to give them their lives, and to perswade them to preserve themselves. The King himself seeing them in this deplorable condition, caused Provisions to be distributed amongst them, and assured them of pardon if they would leave the rebellious Cossacks and return to their Houses; thus did his Polish Majesty shew his Clemency, and not rigorously put to the sword that rebellious people wherewhereby he must have necessarily depopulated one of the principal Provinces of his Kingdom, which served for a Rampart to the rest, and must consequently have ruined a number of Gentlemen, and chief of the Nobility, who having great Estates there, could not have received their Rents, if the Countrey had been unpeopled. The Peasants in Poland being a part of the Gentlemens inheritance, and by this means they being deprived of their Tenants, it would have been very difficult for them to find others to serve them in the Tenure of Villenage, and this is the true Motive which then and at other times hath hindred the utter ruine of the Cossacks, without which consideration, it would not have been difficult to have destroyed them.

The King judging his presence necessary to terminate this War, and to compleat the Reduction of the Cossacks, made account to march with his whole Army to Kiovia, and from thence to send his Forces and Orders necessary for

for the accomplishing of this design. But the Nobility opposed it, alledging, That the necessity of his Affairs did oblige him to return; and that part of the Army, would be sufficient to perform what remained, That the Cossacks were scattered, and in no condition to rally after this defeat; that if any of them should take up Arms again, the raised Troops would be sufficient to hinder and render useless all their attempts whatsoever, and in one word, that there could be no pretence of leading the Nobility into a Countrey desolate and laid waste by the continual violencies of the Cossacks and Tartars, and where they might be famished; so that upon a general Council held at orla, of all the Commanders and Officers of the Army, it was determined, that those who would return should be satisfied, which were the greater number; and his Majesty of Poland after he had left his Instructions with the Great General Potoski, for the consummating that which he had so happily undertaken, took his journey towards Warsam, Warfaw, having first had a promise from the Nobility of a new supply of Men and Money. The King before his departure also received an account, how that the Cham being informed of the defeat of the Cossacks, had hastened his retreat towards Crim, and that the four thousand Turks who came to their affistance, having also intelligence of it, had passed the Boristhenes with all diligence: This news was accompanied also with that of the defeat of the Cossacks, in Lythuania by Prince Radzevil.

The Cossacks to the number of twelve thousand, Commanded by Niebaba one of their Generals, had placed themselves near to Loiowogrod, at the entrance of the River Sefz into the Boristhenes, where after they had made Works to secure to themselves the passage over those Rivers, their General left Forcesto guard them. Prince Radzevil, General of Lythuania, hearing of this, resolved to set upon them, and to this effect, sent beforehim Major General Mirski with three thousand chofen sen men, with Orders to pass the Boristhenes, and he himself embarked with the rest of his Foot and his Artillery, while his Horse marched by Land, at his arrival heset upon their intrenchments on one side, while that Mirski to whom he had given the signal by the discharge of some of his Cannon, was to fall upon the other; the Cossacks defended themselves bravely for an hour and half, after which they were overthrown and cut in pieces. Niebaba coming with his Army to the relief of his.

Prince Radzevil, although that Mirski were not yet joyned with him, as having not passed the River which parted them, neglected not to incounter him, and after a sharp conflict, in which three of the principal Colonels of the Cossacks and Niebaba their General was slain, overthrew their Army, killed three thousand men, took many prisoners, and amongst the rest the Nephew of Niebaba, the rest saved themselves in their Camp, which was not far from the place of Battel, which they also sodainly abandoned, as also the City of Lubiecz, and Czernobelnear to it, who yielded up themselves without making any great resistance to Gonsienski, General of the Artillery of Lythuania; after which Prince Radzevil took his way towards Kiovia, to put an end to the remainder of the Rebellion in those parts.

General Potoski imployed himself to the same purpose in Volhynia, where the difficulty of getting Provisions having forced him to divide his Army into many parts, he appointed their Rendezvous to be at Lubertowa, a Town which in the heat of all the war had preserved it self by the convenience of its scituation, and number of its Inhabitants, and from thence to goe and make an attempt upon Pawolocz and Bialacierkiew, giving a strict Command, that the Officers should order it, that their Soldiers should so behave themselves in that manner, that the Peasants might by no means be constrained to quit their Houses, or to destroy what Provisions were left. The Gentlemen also tookall care to bring the Peasants to their former duty, promising them by Letters and Messages, that they should be most favourably dealt withal, if they would return to their obedience.

In the mean time Kmielniski having with a summe of Money, appealed the Cham and freed himself, returned into Ukrain to strengthen and confirme the minds of those people, which the last defeat and his absence had very much shaken; and taking the same course as formerly, in those places where he could not be in person, by his Letters and Emissaries, he gave new heat to their courage, which was very much abated, exhorting them to maintain the cause of the Publick, and putting them in mind how fortune was momentary and changeable, and if of late she had declared her self in favour of the Poles, yet she had left the Cossacks Strength and forces sufficient to renew the war and recover their losses, and to feed their hopes, he gave out that one Ragoci in Poland was revolted, and thereby had obliged the King to draw back back the greatest part of his Army to stop his progress, that the Flower of the old Cossackian Militia was gathering together, and that in few days the Tartars would come and joyn with them again to revenge their last defeat, and to keep up the hopes of this people still more high, from time to time he difpatched several Embassies to the Cham, which he accompanied with magnificent promises to induce him to afford him new supplies, remonstrating to him that the security of both their fortunes depended upon it, and that the ruine of the one would infallibly expose the other to the Polish power; he sent also three Envoyes to the Ottoman Court, to represent to them, that if the Cossacks were assisted by the Grand Signior, they might be in a condition to make head against all the Forces of Poland, but if they were abandoned, they must be necessitated to an accommodation, and in the end to make war against himself.

Prince

Prince Janus Radzevil, to whom Hlebowitz, Palatine of smolensko was joyned, having left Fronckewitz, Lieutenant-Collonel of the Hussars, with some Forces about Czernihow, to hinder the excursions of that Garrison, went towards Kiovia; after they had forced from those Quarters the Cossackian Collonels, Antonio and Orkussa, and put their Forces into such disorder, that they were constrained to burn their Tabor, and their Bridge, and fly into the Town; neither did they stay there any time, for the terror of the march of the Lythuanian Army spreading it self through the rest of the Cossackian Forces, who thought to shelter themselves in the Countrey about, they quitted that Town, which was one of their principal Retreats. The Inhabitants seeing they were deprived of their Garrison, and all other means of defending themselves, sent their Supplications to the Polish General by their Archbishop, and their Archimandrit or Abbot of their chief Greek Monastery, requesting of him that he would spare that that City which the King had always the goodness to preserve, and which during the last wars, had served for a place of refuge to the Polish Nobility, which request was granted by Prince Radzevil, who onely disarmed them, to take away from them for the suture the opportunity of doing ill.

Kmielniski hearing of the loss of Kiovia, doubled his diligence, and fought out all means imaginable to bring a new 'Army into the Field, able to stop the progress of his enemies, and the unfortunate posture of his affairs suggested counsel to himfull of fury and despair: in the middle of which, he found not only his Cossacks, but a great part of the Peafants also inclined to try again the fortune of the war, and among these latter, there were some who openly declared, that it was difgraceful to them to be dejected for the ill success ofone Battel, and that those who overcame them now, they had formerly overcome, and the same might be performed again; but if that Fortune should should obstinately declare her self for the Poles, there was still a place left them to retreat into, the Countrey of the Turks, where they might live with more freedom then in Russia, to which intent they had already wrote to the Bassa of Silistria.

So that many of the Pealants went every day to joyn with Kmielniski, and the Cossacks began their incursions and violencies in many places, particularly those who inhabit near the Niester and Wallachia who are more accustomed to these Robberies then the other. General Potoski had sent out two thousand menunder the Command of the starroste of Kamienecz his son against them. but instead of sending him the recruits which he demanded, he called him back again, judging it more convenient to to keep his Forces in one body, the General sent afterwards seven Squadrons towards Bialacierkiew to hear news of the Cossacks, but instead of obeying their Orders, they fell to plunder a Town called Pawolocz, and were met Witha withal by two thousand coffacks, and five hundred Tartars not far from thence, who set upon them, and drove them to the Gates of that Town, took away all their booty, and had utterly defeated them, had not the Forces of the Duke of Wisnowitz arrived in time to their assistance, by whose help they made head against those who pursued them, and drove part of them into their Tabor, and part into Bialacerkiew, it was known by some Tartar prisoners, taken upon this occasion, that there were but two thousand of them with Kmielniski, but that in a few days four thousand others were expected, and that the rest of those Infidels were gone to refresh their Horses in the Pastures of the defart Plains, and had received Orders to be in readiness to return upon the first occasion into Poland. This news made General Potoskito delay his march, till the arrival of his Foot and Baggage; when deliberating in Council, with his Officers what was to be done; they determined to seize upon Chzastowa, a Town on the way to Kiovia, to facilitate cilitate their communication with it and their joyning with Prince Radzewil; while they lay expecting the Foot at Pawolocz, which marched but flowly; the Plague took away in the flower of his age Michael Koributh, Duke of Wisniwitz, who had given sufficient proof of his Valor and singular Conduct in all this War, by which he was deprived of the Revenue of a great Estate in Ukrain.

After that the Army had spent the five and twentieth of August in rendring their last Devoirs to this great person, they marched the next day towards Trylisicz, a place well fortified; this Garrison having sent a sierce answer to the summons of the Polish General to surrender themselves, he Commanded Priemski-General of the Artillery, and Commissary of the Army, and Berg, Lieutenant-Colonel to the Regiment of Prince Bogislaus Radzevil, with seven hundred German Foot to attacque them; they lost threescore or fourscore men in the approaches, with with Captain Strayse, and Captain Wahl, but being relieved with the Polish Foot, in two hours time they made themselves Masters of the Town and Castle, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance of the belieged, among whom, even the Women did good service, and fought with their Sithes; all here were put to the fword without distinction of Sex or Age. The Governor of the place, a Cossack, was hanged in the heat of blood; the Town was plundered, and what could not be carried away, was with it reduced to Ashes, and this severity wrought better effects then perhaps Clemency could have done, for the Flames being perceived by those of Chwastowa, the three hundred Cos-Sacks which guarded that Town, forfook it, and the Inhabitants also followed their example, although they might well have relifted the Poles, and put them to the expense of a great number of men,

Prince Radzevil expecting the Kings Orders, and that the Polish Army should come come to him, kept himself always near to Kiovia, not without some danger; the Enemy endeavouring by all means possible to surprize him, or at least to hinder the General Potoski from joyn ing with him. Upon the fixteenth of August Colonel Nold being sent out by this Prince, discovered by the Windmil near to the Gate of Kiovia, called the Gilded Gate, a great body of Cosfacks mingled with Tartars, which soon allarmed the Camp, and a party of Light Horse set upon them with such courage, that after they had taken a Bridge which the enemies put much trust in for the securing themselves, they killed a thousand of them upon the place; some of the prisoners confessed that this body of three thousand men was to have joyned with a thousand more, with designe of falling upon the Lythuanian Army in their intrenchments.

Prince Radzevil after this advantage, fet forward to joyn with the Polish Army, after that he had left a sufficient Garrison in Kiovia, and furnished it with all things necessary for its preservation: General Potoski having sent fifteen hundred men before him, advanced with the rest of his Army as far as Vasilikow, to facilitate their conjunction; Kmielniski finding himself unable to hinder this, and foreseeing the dammage he must receive from it, deputed divers to the General to Treat with him about an accommodation, and to desire him to interpose the credit he had with the Senate and the Polish Army, to prevent the effusion of so much blood as was ready to be spilled, and to bring the Cos-Sacks in favour again with his Majesty of Poland, affuring him they would remain faithful in his service, and most Religiously observe the Treaty of Zborow; these propositions of peace presented by Kmielniski, made small impressions upon the mind of the Polish General, who being well informed of the continual addresses which he made to the Port, and to the Cham, to obtain a speedy supply, and consequently understood that all what hedid, was but but to gain time and leisure to establish his affairs; he resolved without delay to terminate this controversie by force of Arms. The Polish Army being now considerably reinforced, by the conjunction of the Lythuanians, consisting of nine thousand chosen men; Kmielniski although he had received a fresh supply of fix thousand Tartars, did not neglect to make another attempt towards an accommodation, and the Palatine of Kiovia endeavoured with divers arguments to induce the Generals to put an end to this War, rather by a general Pardon, then by the centinuation of so many cruelties; reprefenting to them that the many troubles which the foldiers had undergone in this Campagnia, and the Diseases reigning amongst them, had diminished, and did diminish daily a great number of them, so that the Generals Potoski and Radzevil, condescended to receive the Cossacks deputed to come and desire peace. Kmielniski desiring that some one might be dispatched to him, to conferre with Vihouski his Secretary, and and intimate Friend, they sent to him Makouski, a Captain of Horse, with a Letter to him from the General Potoski, but because he gave him not the Title of General of the Zaporovian Army, this omission was taken for a great injury, and made a disturbance among the Cossacks; but Makouski having appealed them by giving them sufficient reasons for what was done; the conference began, in which the Polish Deputy proposed, that Kmielniski should send away the Tartars, and come himself to the Polish Camp and pay his respects to their Generals; he was a gainst the first of these propositions for a long time, whatsoever his Secretary could doe to draw from him his consent, but in the end he agreed to one as well as the other, although his Officers and the Kussian Peasants expressed a great deal of repugnancy for the lat-But finding it not convenient to continue this conference in the Cossacks Camp, lest that the Tartars suspecting what they Treated of might attempt something against the persons of the Com ?

Commissioners, Vihouski did very much instance that it might be removed to Bialacierkiew.

Makouski giving an account to the Generals of the Polish Army, of his Negotiation with the Cossacks, it was thought expedient to fend Commissioners to Bialacierkiew as they desired, to this intent were deputed the Palatines of Kiovia and Smolensko. Zowzienski, High Steward of Lythuania and Cossacouski, second Judge of Braclam, whom they guarded with a great Convoy, of which five hundred Horse onely were permitted to enter the Town. These Commissioners Treating with those of Kmielniski, agreed of all the conditions of peace, excepting some few points which were afterwards to be decided in the two Camps, but were in great danger of their lives, first in the Army of the Cossacks, where Kmielniski and his Officers had enough to doe to defend them from the violencies of the Tartars, and the Peasants, who could not endure any propositions of Peace, ful?

fulpecting always that one of their Articles would be to reduce them to their former servitude. The Tartars also set upon them in their return, and plundered part of their Baggage.

In the mean time General Potoski and Prince Radzevil, seeing that the Treaty was almost concluded, removed from Hermanowka to Bialacerkiew, the place where Kmielniski and the principal Commanders of the Cossacks were to renew their Oath of Allegiance to the King and State, at the approach of the Polish Army, the Cossacks seemed to be very much surprized, but they being certified that it was upon no other deligne then to oppose the incurfions of the Tartars, new Commissioners were sent on both sides to conclude of what was left undecided at the last conference.

But the Cossacks instead of that prefented new propositions, as if they had forgot what had been so lately determined, demanding the performance of the Treaty Treaty at Zborow; that the Polish Army should leave the frontiers, and give them liberty to maintain their confederacy with the Tartars, whom they acknowledged to be the true defenders of their priviledges; so that after the Poles had reproached them of their lightness and infidelity, which must needs proceed from the news of some new supply from the Tartars, or the false report of the Grand Signior his sending some considerable Forces; they drew up their Army, and committed the right wing to Prince Radzevil with his Lythuanians, the left to Kalinouski, and reserved the main body for General Potoski. The Cossacks and Tartars came also out of their Camp, as if they had no other designe but to observe the posture of the Poles; there passed divers skirmishes between them for three days, and divers Companies of the Enemie hid themselves in Thickets and close places, making frequent attempts upon the Polish Army, annoying them sometimes in the Flanck, and sometimes in the Reer, which it is thought they did did to make the Polish Generals more tractable, and to obtain more advanta gious conditions of peace. In the mean time they being wearied with the delays of Kmielniski, who pretended to disallow of all these attempts and skirmishes; and being earnest with him to declare his mind, he fent them upon the 26 of September, three Deputies to endeavor seriously the conclusion of the Treaty; these were much more moderate in their demands, although they were very different also from those agreed upon at Bialacerkiem; for after they had concluded that the number of the Cossacks inrolled, should amount to twenty thousand, they demanded also that they might have their Quarters in the Palatinates of Braelaw and Czernihow, and this being refused, they insisted, that at least the Polish Forces should not be quartered there during: the time that Kmielniski was employed in inrolling the Cossackian Militia; and that they should give him for his own maintenance, the Territories of Czircasy and Borowitza. Potoski gave them.

to understand, that this latter demand could not be granted without express Orders from the King and State, but condescended to the other, after that Kmielniski had secretly informed him that he infifted upon it only to content the revolted Pealants, whom he thought not fit to irritate so long as they kept together, and made so considerable a body, so that there remained nothing but that he and his chief Officers should come and make their submissions to the Polish Generals, which he was inclinable enough to do, after he had received Hostages for his security, though divers of his Officers with great difficulty were brought to consent to it. Upon the 28 of September, he and the principal Commanders of the Cossacks came to the Polish Camp, where with much Humility, and the Tears in his Eyes (which he had always ready to shed, when the necessity of his affairs required) he asked Pardon of the Great General Potoski, and saluted Prince Radzevil, and the rest of the Nobility with all respect. In his presence were the 111 vian Army should send Deputies to the next Diet, most humbly to thank the King and the State for the pardon which he had granted them.

A short time after the conclusion of this peace, the Great General Potoski died of an Apoplexy in the Town of Laticzow, worn out with years and the continual wearisome labors of War; in which he ferved, first under the famous General Zolkiewitz, he had been in a languishing condition since his last imprisonment in Tartary; and his great courage niade him neglect those Remedies necessary for the re-establishment of his health; so desiring nothing else, as he would openly declare it to his friends, but to die in the Wars, and to finish his life in his Profession; his desires were at last accomplished, and beyond the satisfaction of ending his life so gloriously, he had this also; just at his death to terminate by his Valor and Conduct, a War so cruel and ruinous to his Countrey.
